It is one of the significant facts in the history of every organization that it develops in its membership a more or less definite conscicnce upon some one question or more. This is true of business man's association, a labor union or denomination. A group of bankers finds itself exceedingly sensitive on the subject of promptness in the payments of commercial obligations. The one sin which cannot be forgiven is delinquency. A labor union is quite indifferent to this matter and a hundred others but it has a most sensitive conscience on the subject of loyalty to the union. The last disgrace is to be a "scab." An institution of learning develops in its members a loyalty to the scientific method of research. The task of its instructors is to ascertain and to interpret the facts. At all hazards and at any price academic honesty must prevail. The man who will exchange his single-minded devotion to truth for rewards either social or financial is an outlaw in the world of scholarship.

Similarly every denomination develops a conscience. Perhaps it has more than one, as the number of its interests increases, but in the end one will come to take precedence of all others. No religious body falls outside of this statement. It may not be evident upon first acquaintance what that point of conscience is, but growing knowledge of its life and interest will lead to its discovery. It would be easy to point out the chief elements of denominational conscience in the leading Christian bodies of our day. It might be supposed that the names which they have chosen or by which they are usually known might indicate the matter which was of greatest concern. But this is not true. Perhaps it was really the case that the devotion of the early Methodists to a plan or method of work gave them their name; but this cannot be called their chief point of conscience today. It was the fact that the Baptists insisted upon biblical obedience in this rite as a sign of membership in their churches, yet today baptism is not their point of conscientious sensitiveness. The Congregationalists never set the form of church organization, with which their name is connected, above other and more important matters. Perhaps the Episcopalians approach most closely to an agreement between their denominational title and their chief point of existence.

On what theme is the conscience of the Disciples most acute? One would like to claim that it is loyalty to Christ as the divine Lord and Savior, or the inspiration and authority of Holy Scripture, especially the New Testament, as the rule of belief and conduct, or that great subject which historically has given validity to this reformation—the unity of the people of God, or the later development, as one of the necessities of the times, of the principle of restoration of the New Testament Christianity. We believe that there are many Disciples who hold one or another of these interests as supreme, and whose consciences are very sensitive on these points. Yet we raise the question whether taken as a whole the subject upon which we have deeper feeling than any other is not that of baptism.

This ordinance was little understood either as to form or meaning when the work of the reformers began. It was a matter of sore perplexity and finally of heroic obedience on the part of the fathers themselves. It is not strange that as an outward rite, evident to all in the progress of the movement, it should have become very dear to our people. It is unfortunate that it should have become the most notable theme for controversy in our discussions with others, But for this we were not wholly to blame, and history controversy. cannot be rewritten. It is perfectly certain that for the Disciples baptism is and will continue to be the immersion in water of penitent believers in the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. No one of whom we know has any wish to change this hard-won and much-prized position.

But baptism is not the most important thing in the Christian life. No Disciple would hold that it is a saving ordinance in the high and holy sense in which faith saves men, or in which the new life of penitence and trust is essential to the child of God. It has its place and is not to be ignored. It is the beautiful act in which are mirrored the washing away of sin, the passion of Jesus, and the soul's union with him in death, burial and resurrection. But any attempt to make it the chief concern of a religious movement like our own is a misplacing of emphasis, a wrong use of rightful enthusiasm. For this reason we deprecate any utterance which conveys the impression that the Disciples are chiefly sensitive in the subject of baptism, and that they will tolerate laxness on any other theme more readily than on this.

Equally do we deprecate any effort to rob baptism of its true and impressive place in the program of Christian obedience. And this for two reasons: First, because it is an injustice to our history and purposes as a Bible loving people. Secondly, because any such effort is certain to react in a fresh campaign of legalism which, in panic for the safety of a cherished rite, forces it again into a prominence and exclusiveness of regard which has ever been our most fruitful source of danger.

There is a better way. Give baptism its rightful place, as one gives to a marriage service. But put chief emphasis upon the greater things of love, loyalty and character. We ought to have a very rapid development of conscience regarding other matters, such as education, benevolence, missions, the enlistment of men in the ministry, the work of men in the churches, and the life of prayer. These things should we do, and not leave the other undone. No sign of growth in an individual or a body of Christians is more impressive than the increasing importance of the things on which the conscience is sensitive. Let us put first things first.

TEACHER TRAINING.

Many inquiries have come to the CHRISTIAN CENTURY during the past few months for helps suitable for use in teacher training classes. The number of titles in this field of literature has grown rapidly of late, chiefly owing to the influence of the Religious Education Association and its insistence upon a more thorough preparation on the part of Sunday school teachers for their work. The International Sunday School Association has admirably fostered the same interest and has supplied not a little helpful literature upon the theme.

At the same time it appears to be evident that a text book which is both accurate and within the comprehension of the average group of teachers has not yet been produced. Several of the best works in this field are somewhat above the level of the teacher as we find them in the Sunday school. On the other hand those manuals which are more elementary lack both in the competence of the information they furnish and in the scientific character of their classifications. It is true that no work of this kind which attempts in a serious spirit to assist Sunday school teachers is without value. The fact that some of these text books, faulty as they are both in substance and arrangement, should have found apparently wide employment speaks eloquently for the sense of need on the part of the leaders in Sunday school work.

To the requests which have come insisting that the CHRISTIAN CENTURY undertake the preparation of some helps of this character careful attention has been given. We have decided to issue a series of studies in our columns and have already assurances that these will be used in the teacher training classes with which the inquirers are connected. We doubt not that there are others who will find value in them.

Our purpose is not that of competition. To our inquirers hitherto we have pointed out the best books of which we know, whether published by our own people or by others. We believe that it is only by multiplying helps that the best results will be obtained in the end. We have no special desire to produce merely an asset for the publication department of this journal. Our wish is rather to assist those who need help and who are not finding what they desire elsewhere. We shall be very glad to hear from others of our readers than those who have thus far communicated with us, and to receive such suggestions as they may wish to make.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Business Men's Association of the Christian churches of Chicago has taken up with enthusiasm the preparations for the state convention to be held here in September. It was at first intended that the gathering should be held in the Jackson Boulevard church, of which Parker Stockdale is pastor. But upon reflection it has been decided that a larger and more central place should be found, and the auditorium of the Young Men's Christian Association has been secured. This will be much more commodious and accessible. The churches are planning to entertain the conventionin the most hospitable fashion. All hope for a large and helpful convention.

Our amiable contemporary, The Standard, of Cincinnati, vibrates between the policy of lavishing vituperation upon the men, institutions and journals which do not follow the path it points out, and passing them over in offended silence. Our attention has been called by several readers to the fact that in a recent list of journals published by the Disciples by a contributor to The Standard, the name of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY was stricken out by the editor. This is quite a harmless diversion. The Turks have a way of wiping off from their official maps those nations which have displeased them. But such nations never seem quite aware of the fact.

The Resurrection of Christ

H. L. Willett

The outstanding facts of the gospel, as given statement by Paul (1 Cor. 15), are the death, burial and resurrection of Christ, in accordance with the foreshadowings of the Hebrew Scriptures. To these foreshadowings reference is made in several New Testament passages. To the disciples gathered in Jerusalem on the evening of the resurrection day Jesus alluded to the recent events as confirmations of Scripture, declaring, "Thus it is written that the Christ should suffer and rise from the dead the third day" (Lu. 24:46). In a similar manner Paul, in addressing the Thessalonian Jews, "reasoned with them from the Scriptures, opening and alleging that it behooved the Christ to suffer and to rise again from the dead." (Acts 17:3). To the Jews in Antioch and Pisidia the same apostle set forth the resurrection of Jesus as the fulfillment of a pledge made to Israel in the past. "We bring you," said he, "good tidings of the promise made unto the fathers, how that God hath fulfilled the same unto our children in that he raised up Jesus." (Acts 13:33.)

Such statements make their appeal, not to any specific declarations of the Old Testament regarding a resurrection of the Messiah, for there are none; but rather to those glowing hopes of a successful issue to the divine Servant's work, such as the Evangelical Prophet sets forth (Isa. 53), together with other hints of revival, national or individual (Hosea 6:2), and dreams of escape from the power of death (Ps. 16:10; Isa. 50:6), the utterances of personal faith on the part of Old Testament saints. The use of such passages as messianic, though they must be excluded from any predictive reference to the life of our Lord, is justified, not only by the Jewish method of applying Scripture, as seen in Paul's writings (cf. Esp. Acts 13:33-41), but as well by the underlying and organic connection between the Old and New Testament ministries of redemption, which summed up all things in the messianic age and office, and therefore made legitimate from the broader viewpoint, the application of a personal or national sentiment to the one in whom all religious experiences of Israel's life had their consummation. The significance of such Old Testament utterances as applicable to the messianic ministry was certainly not understood either by the mass of the Jewish people, or by the disciples of our Lord, who had in view a completion of his work radically different from this.

The first distinctive note, therefore, of the approaching tragedy and its glorious sequel was struck by Jesus himself in the announcement to his followers that he should suffer many things of the chief priests and scribes, and be put to death; but also that he should rise again on the third day. The synoptic gospels unite in the testimony that the earliest hint of the on-coming events was given by Jesus in connection with those climacteric occurrences of his ministry, the confession of Peter and the Transfiguration (Matt. 16:21; Mk. 8:31; Lu. 9:22; Matt. 179, 23; Mk: 9:9).

This was probably six months before the final week. The reference to the resurrection contained in the words "destroy this temple and in three days I will build it up" recorded early in the Fourth Gospel (2:19) is indeterminate as regards its place in the record of Jesus' life, owing to the lack of chronological order observed in the narrative of this Gospel.

What was the character of Jesus' foreknowledge of these events? One may hold the view that he knew from the first the issue of his work, and foresaw with distinctness its tragic yet majestic and victorious consummation. To this view the sequel of the temptation as the deliberate choice of the more difficult but necessary pathway to redemptive success, gives weight. On the other hand, may we, with some, suppose that a ministry which opened with hope for a peaceful and gradual attainment of his purposes through the spiritual conquest of Jerusalem and its people, was gradually shadowed by the signs of Israel's recalcitrant and obstinate refusal to accept its messianic King, and Jesus was brought at length to face the necessity of death? This question can only be resolved in harmony with others involving the limitations of our Lord's knowledge. Any position short of clear insistence upon this absolute foreknowledge, would naturally rest upon the following considerations, which may be found not inadequate as a view of Jesus' attitude toward the outcome of his work:

1. He fully believed in his messianic mission.

2. The Old Testament prophecies, based on the experiences of Israel and looking forward to the messianic ministries of the future, predicted humiliation, suffering, death and apparent failure as assured features of that program. With this view coincided the experiences of Jesus' ministry as it neared its climax. The hope of a peaceful conquest of Israel by means of such campaigns of preaching as he had inaugurated grew ever more remote. The attitude of the leaders of church and state made his position one of increasing peril. At the same time no compromise was possible. The sacrificial life must complete itself by a sacrificial death. Only thus could he register his final protest against the policy of selfishness and worldliness which was dominant in his day.

3. The prophecies of the successful issue of the messianic work made it impossible that the humiliation and death should end all. But Jesus did not rest upon prophecy alone. As a proof of this it is sufficient to point out the entire absence of any Old Testament prediction of the messianic resurrection, much less of that as occurring on the third day. Nevertheless Jesus spoke with assurance. The power of life in him was greater than any outward power of death. He knew that his messianic work could not fail in the end, and a Messiah held in bond by death was beyond thought. Nor is it clear that Jesus regarded his resurrection as a logical necessity inhering in his messianic program. It seems rather that it was to him simply the natural rebound of a life like his from the power of death. It was impossible that he should be holden of it. The resurrection was the disclosure of the inherent power of Jesus' life. It was the first ripe fruit that appeared on the tree of his perfect nature, a fruit eagerly laid hold of by the early church as its most prized possession. More difficult is the explanation of his confident statement that his resurrection should transpire on the third day, which occurs repeatedly. The entreating words of Hosea to Israel, "Come, let us return unto Jehovah, for he hath torn and he will heal us: after two days he will revive us, and on the third day he will raise us up" (Hos. 6:1-2), can afford us no hint, beyond a mere form of speech, inapplicable as they are to our Lord's resurrection. There is, perhaps, in these very words, however, the hint that the expression as used by Jesus was a common method of referring to any period of very brief duration. The apparent indifference with which the two very dissimilar terms. "on the third day," and "after three days" are exchanged in the repeated references upon a precisely foreseen period of burial, and disclose his real reference made by Jesus to this event whereas but one of them can with exactness be applied, may preclude any emphasis to the brevity of death's dominion over him.

With a consideration of the impression made by these words upon the disciples, however, we come once more on firm ground. Their total inability to comprehend Jesus when he spoke of his death and resurrection must be referred (1) to the impression which the prevalent idea of a triumphant Messiah had made upon them, now that they had identified him at last with this ideal figure; (2) to the impossibility of understanding how Jesus could die and yet carry to completion his purposes; (3) to the common use of figures of speech in their daily language, to which they had grown especially accustomed in the teachings of Jesus, and which enabled them to divert the current of his apparently specific declarations into channels less imperiling their messianic hopes.

It is clear that they had not the faintest comprehension of the coming tragedy, and when its shock broke upon them, their distress was relieved by no recollections of the encouragement which the predictions of the resurrection might have afforded. Apparently when the danger became imminent, they waited in hope that some unforeseen providence would intervene to save Jesus from death; with every step of the advancing trial the tension became more acute. They looked for rescue up to the very last, and when all was over, they went away from the tragic spot utterly crushed and broken hearted, repeating those most pathetic words of Scripture, "we trusted that this had been he who should redeem Israel." They did not believe in him or love him less. They did not doubt his messiahship. But they saw that he had failed, encountering as he had the stiff and unrelenting opposition of his own people, whose co-operation was essential to his success. He had come unto his own, and they that were his own received him not.

The immediate steps taken to dispose of the body of Jesus after his death reveal the total absence of hope on the part of the disciples. Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, who embalmed it, and the women who prepared the spices for it, could have known of no expectations of resurrection. And the disciples themselves, by the incredulity with which they received the first tidings that the Master had risen, set the seal of certainty upon this negative attitude. Apparently the predictions of Jesus had produced more effect on the Jews than on his own followers, for while the latter hoped for nothing, the former took precautions against the possible fulfillment of his words by guarding the sepulchre (Matt. 27:6). If the laws of testimony lead to assured results, the documents of the New Testament yield the unshaken verdict that our Lord reappeared to his disciples after a death made certain by the most adequate tests. Into the various theories by which attempt is made to explain away the fact of the resurrection, or to break its force, it is needless to enter here. They run through a gamut of hypotheses from the crude and impossible assumption that the disciples stole the body and declared their Master had risen, on through the theories of swooning, of imagination on the part of Mary, of vision as maintained by Renau and Reville, of legend as with Strauss, up to that of spiritual vision, as held by Keim, which last view demands as truly a manifestation of the living Lord as does the orthodox belief.

The difficulties encountered by all or most of these views are those plainly attested facts which lie upon the surface of narratives whose agreement is striking, though not complete. Of these facts the chief is the return of hope to a despairing and unexpectant group of disciples.

This makes it necesary for us to rec-

America as a Mission Field

That means the United States and Canada, one-sixth of the earth's surface. It means nintey millions of persons, one fifteenth the world's population, nearly seventy millions of whom are outside the evangelical churches. It means the most intelligent, enlightened and most prosperous communities of equal size in the world. It means political and religious liberty not enjoyed elsewhere by our race—we know neither kings, popes, nor state churches. It so emphatically means "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" as to draw a million a year from the poor and oppressed of other lands. It means an elect people and place, and since he hath dealt with us as with no others, our people should be righteous, and sin and violence should no more be heard in the land. It means world opportunity and world mission. Here should be evolved the highest Christian character, and here wrought out the ideal, the truly American church; here answered first that prayer, "That they all may be one;" here first the social mission of the church be fully known and lived, and here first his will be done on earth, and here first a redeemed and united people with one heart and one soul take up the cry, "O send out the Light and thy Truth," and the church, as such, fling herself upon the heathen and apostate world.

Today is big with opportunity for the Disciples of Christ—both church and world will hear our plea for a united people of God. In forty states and all of Canada, this plea must be uttered and made effective by the accredited agent of our brotherhood—The American Christian Missionary Society. Not to support this society is to retard the work, while to aid it liberally is to hasten the reign of Christ. Philanthrophy, patriotism, Christianity, all cry with the voice of many waters:—"Save America for her own and for the world's sake!" Home Missions is the means; The American Christian Missionary Society the agent, May third, the day of offering. O, man, make an offering worthy of your home, your country and your God!

Twentieth Century Church Equipment

S. R. Badgley

Church architecture affords a noble channel through which to give tangible expression to the spirit of love, loyalty and sacrifice. Religion supplies the most exalted themes for the creative arts. Church buildings are in a peculiar sense public property. Erected and sustained by a public purse, they occupy places of conspicuous prominence in the public eye, hence their duty and power to add to the picturesque, the artistic and the sublime.

The church building being, first of all, the house of God should be more than utilitarian: it should be dignified, substantial, beautiful, educative, and uplifting. As it is the office and work of the church to regenerate, educate and elevate the spiritual in man, so the building and material equipment of the church should minister to the eye and mind in such a manner as to produce both inspiration and aspiration. As Israel of old offered only the unblemished in sacrifice, so should the church of to-day, in recognition of its fuller ministry, receive our best and purest gifts.

Just as the living church stands for all that is truthful, noble and permanent in character and religion, so should its edifices stand for the same qualities in art. It is not essential that a church building should be expensive in construction, nor elaborate in detail in order to give expression to these sentiments, but it should always be correct in architectural style and substantial in structural character.

Church architecture must necessarily combine the practical with the historic and esthetic. Foundations must be secure, walls and roof constructed to resist the action of the elements, comfortable and convenient accommodations provided for all forms of worship and service, and heating and ventilation supplied by the most thorough and least complicated methods. Ventilation should be as nearly as possible independent of windows and automatic in operation. Proper lighting for both day and evening services is a prime necessity. Good acoustics for both speaking and music is of vital importance. There should be sufficient resonance to bring out the full value and quality of musical tones and to carry the voice to all parts of the room alike, but not enough to produce an echo or prolongation of articulate sounds.

A church building should be conveniently arranged and carefully adapted to the comfort, needs and requirements of the people who use it.

An artist in decorating once said, "I must know what my clients eat for breakfast before I will undertake to decorate their homes." Just so an architect should be familiar with every feature of the life of a church before undertaking to design a building for its use.

Church furniture and decorations should be in perfect harmony with the style of architecture. Many good churches have been spoiled with job-lot commercial furniture. Art glass, mosaic, fresco, marble, tiling and stucco constitute a rich field for the emblematic, historic and instructive in embellishment. The past is our heritage, and no church should be ashamed or ashamed to use that which is good in art and symbol. The cross, the altar and the baptistery may all be used as beautiful architectural features.

In addition to the distinctive needs of each denomination or branch of the church, every congregation has its individuality, its peculiar methods of work and local organizations, all of which should be taken into account and provided for in planning a building which is to be its house of worship and workshop combined. To produce such a building requires and deserves careful study and united thought on the part of the committee and architect to whom the work is committed.

Many and varied are the problems, conditions, influences, desires and suggestions which the church architect and building committee are called upon to consider. Not all conditions are favorable to best results, but all are deserving of best efforts.

The educative power of good housing is a subject worthy of serious consideration.

It is inexcusable for any college or institution of learning and unpardonable for any church to erect and maintain buildings which are abnormally incorrect in design. Bad architecture is as baneful as bad grammar and more enduring in its influence than unorthodox preaching, which will probably be forgotten before the next following Sunday.

Some churches, while guarding very jealously their orthodox teaching, which is inevitably subject to revision, have by organized extension societies filled the country with church buildings which, to say the least, are sadly lacking in orthodox architecture; and official church papers usually describe such buildings when dedicated as the handsomest and most complete in their district.

Our churches should be leading exponents of good taste and correct style. It costs no more and frequently less to erect buildings of architectural merit than is often expended in the creation of monstrosities.

The advantage of good situation and good architecture from a business standpoint is being recognized in all lines of trade.

Business men realize that in these days of keen competition their chances of success are greatly enhanced by a thoroughly modern and artistic building and equipment, as a result of which we are developing good livery stable architecture, good play house architecture, good factory architecture, good mercantile architecture, and leading in the march, and for a greater business we must have good church architecture.

The necessity for better churches increases with the betterment of our dwellings and other buildings. The house in which we worship God and in which our children are taught to know and love him, should be as correct in design, attractive in appearance and comfortable in equipment as the house in which we live or do business. With some, church-going is the habit of their lives; they attend and take part in the services because they have been trained to do so, and are not so very exacting as to the accomodations of the building, but there are thousands of people especially in our cities, who have no special inclination toward the church, and are critical in their judgment of men and things. To them it appears inconsistent that the Lord's house should be inferior to the domestic and business houses of his children.

A large and important class with whom the city church especially must reckon is composed of young men and women who come in from rural districts and smaller towns. These find the city full of attractions to which they were heretofore strangers. The great majority of them have been carefully reared in Christian homes and taught to attend and love their church, which to them meant the best of their advantages in the way of culture, instruction and inspiration. In order to attract and retain these very desirable young people, the church must keep abreast of other attractions, hence the need of well equipped social rooms to provide for the gregarian instincts of young people.

Sociability may be genuinely religious, and there is no better place to encourage and provide for such sociability than in connection with the church. It may be said that the ideal place for young people to meet is at home, but all young people are not in homes, and all homes are not ideal. In this practical age the church must recognize conditions as they exist and cope with them in a practical manner.

To what extent games and amusements should be provided for in the social department of a church and the nature of such games and amusements may be a matter of opinion to be settled by each individual church, but we think it fair to say that any class of entertainment considered safe in the home could do no harm in the social rooms of a church. The largest and most important class to which the church is called upon to minister, and on which its future most largely depends, is composed of the children of our homes, and for these no sacrifice can be too great and no building too attractive. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven" can be said of our twentieth century children just as truthfully as of those whom the Master set before his critical disciples.

OUR PLEA FOR UNION IN THE NEW COUNTRY.

The new country is a ripe field for our plea. There men have broken with the old and are ready for the new. There are a few families of each of several denominations but not enough to make a church for any one of them, yet each desires a church influence in the community for the sake of their growing families. The Methodists know how to utilize such an opportunity and all over the west will be seen little Methodist churches that are builded by an itinerant evangelist and with the help of missionary money. It is the only church and it gathers in people of all opinions. If we could utilize these opportunities we could take a plea for union and a name that all wear and invite all to a common platform, and in these lands with the forward look could build as no others can. To this union effort we could add the most virile and effective evangelism of the times and outrun all other powers in the community in our efforts for righteousness. We have the society in the A. C. M. S. and we have the money in our churches, and the pastor is the man that can put the two together for the accomplishment of this great work.

WILD GRAPE MISSIONARY OFFERINGS.

Isaiah sings a telling song for his well-beloved, touching his vineyard. (Isa. 5:1-7.) Changing the setting a little, we may put the United States for the house of Israel and the Disciples of Christ for the men of Judah.

Then we have this vineyard in a very fruitful hill.

The Disciples are a rich people. This land has blessed them in basket and store most wonderfully. We have houses and lands and stocks and stores and factories and fast horses and automobiles. Our God showers the fruitage of the land upon us.

Not only so but he cares for us. He keeps this vineyard with personal care. He takes out the stones and fences it and makes ready the wine press. In other words, he has endowed these Disciples in the United States in a most wonderful way. He loves us and has given us, as we think, a little clearer conception of his truth than some others have, and he has wonderfully blessed our preaching of that truth. We are of that great bulk, the common people, and we are intelligent and built on a firm foundation; and "know where we are at," and all that sort of thing. We thank God for what we are. But note: When our Lord had done all this for his well-beloved he stopped and waited. He had sown and cultivated and waited for the harvest. What expectations might he have! He looked that it should bring forth grapes, but —it brought forth wild grapes. Grapes, understand, but wild grapes.

Now when a Disciple in this very fruitful hill out of unselfish love and with a prayer, gives all he can really give to save America, he brings forth grapes. But when he is beseiged by the secretary and the preacher and finally gives a dollar to get rid of them, and to soothe his conscience, that is wild grapes. I often wonder how much of the money we use to save America is wild grape money? The most of it, I venture. When, O when, will those whom the Lord so wonderfully blesses give out of a warm, glowing heart of gratitude and give liberally and hilariously? Of all our missionary needs we need most of all a missionary conscience.

May this year of grace witness a great and glorious crop of rich, sweet grapes for our King.

AN IMMEDIATE OPPORTUNITY.

Oh! for the springing up of a missionary spirit commensurate with the opportunities and demands upon us everywhere, especially in the larger centers of population. Cleveland, for instance, a city of half a million, in 1906 experienced an influx of over 10,000 souls by immigration. Poland, with its 3,082 leads, then comes Italy, Russia, Hungary, Bohemia, and others. The characteristics of these people reared under church and state domination need not be depicted, for we are not ignorant of its devices. The majority of them are Roman Catholics. In one district, where 40,000 of these are huddled together, there are five churches, with an average accommodation of 500 to look after their spiritual welfare. The insufficiency and inequality in moral things is easily perceived. Likewise the neglect of those who claim superior light and zeal for God's house, is plainly and painfully seen. In the light of this—the value of the soul of man—the life to be lived here on earth—the life to be lived here and the blessed life in the eternal kingdom of our Lord, places before the mind of the Disciples of Christ a means scarcely realized before.

Foreign missionary enterprise finds activity and an open door in the midst of our home-land. No need to look with anxious eye to the orient or the islands of the sea.

"We can find the heathen nearer,
We can find them at our door."

Shall we neglect those at our own doors, and fail to reach out the helping hand? Or shall we, by God's grace, bring them up to the full capacity of enjoying God's blessings? Missionaries skilled in the Polish and Bohemian tongues would doubtless do great and lasting good just now. God forbid that we should withhold this boon!

An acorn under proper conditions becomes an oak, from which may spring a whole forest, capable of furnishing material for the building of great ships to carry on the commerce, and cities for the abode of men.

Oh, soul, possessed with capabilities for endless enjoyment and the power to give blessing to others, heed the word of truth, "Work out your own salvation," and save yourself by saving others."

STRONG AS A MULE.

Farmer Gets Power From Food.

Anyone can better his condition, if eating improper food, by changing to the right kind.

It is becoming well known among all classes of people in this country, that strength of mind and body come from the nourishment that is taken into the system in the form of food.

A cowboy whose stomach got all out of order on a ranch, went to farming and incidentally found the cause of his trouble and the way out of it. He writes:

"I was raised on a cow ranch, lived like the rest on beef and potatoes, often eating too much, until my stomach became so weak and I was so run down I had to quit the job.

"Then I tried farming but did not get any better. My nerves were all unstrung and I could not sleep at night. A year ago I saw an ad. about Grape-Nuts being such a wonderful food and told my wife I was going to try it.

"So I bought a box of Grape-Nuts and by the time I had used this food two weeks, the weakness began to leave my stomach.

"Now I weigh 184 lbs., and am as strong as a mule. We eat Grape-Nuts for breakfast, and I also take some as a lunch between meals. I must say that Grape-Nuts is the best food there is, and nearly every one in town, seeing my improvement, has taken to eating it."

Sunday School Lesson--Final Assurances*

H. L. Willett

The wonderful lessons which follow the Twelfth of John are the evangelist's record of Jesus' final words to the disciples. To be sure there may have been occasions when he explained to them more fully the kingdom of God after his resurrection, but those interviews were too mysterious and infrequent to have the same effect upon them as these utterances in the shadow of the cross. There was a feeling of gloom over all hearts when Jesus met them for the Passover supper in the upper room. And this did not diminish as he told them that one of their own number should betray him. His own approaching tragedy, although not indorsed by them, weighed heavy upon all hearts. It is to this disturbed and apprehensive condition of mind that Jesus addressed the words of assurance which form our study.

THE WORD OF COURAGE.

The whole message of the gospel is a trumpet call to courage. The disasters as well as the sins of life bear down the hearts of men. The word of the cross is, "Fear not." The Good News is an assurance of that love of God which sets at defiance all opposing forces. "If God be for us who can be against us." The words of Jesus to his disciples are his words to all his disciples through the ages, "Let not your heart be troubled." They were in doubt about many things which he had not explained to them. They could not understand his failure to assert himself when it seemed to them that he had the nation in his hands. The day of the triumphal entry had been one of sore disappointment. They had still to learn the lesson of implicit trust in their Lord. Their faith in God was a part of the fixed order of their lives. They could not disbelieve in the God whom they had trusted and in whom their fathers had found refuge. Jesus asked them therefore why they should not trust him as well. "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." There was far more reason for trusting the Lord whom they had as their personal friend than the unseen Father, faith in whom was so much less a matter of experience.

THE LORD'S DEPARTURE.

In a certain sense Jesus was also saying to them, "When you trust in God, you are also trusting in me, for it is the same." And now he pointed out to them the significance of this faith. He was to leave them soon, but only for a brief time. As to very little children, Jesus tried to explain to these grown men his reasons for leaving them. The deeper signficance of his departure was certainly one of the "many things" which he had to tell them which they were not yet able to bear. Only by assuring them of the necessity of his going that he might make for them a dwelling, and that he would soon return, could he give them confidence and courage to learn later on the awful secret of his coming tragedy. It is thus that parents bid farewell to their children when the separation seems unnecessary. If the children could understand the hard facts which lie beneath the hopeful words of promise and assurance, nothing could save them from the sheer terror of the parting. It is the remembrance of these comforting words which bears them up in the days which grow long while their hope is slowly changing into the larger realities which they could not at first comprehend.

THE LARGER HOPE.

How very gentle and kindly were Jesus' words to these grown men who were still but little children. In the Father's house to which he was now going there was plenty of room for them. There was no doubt of the future. Jesus would prepare for them a habitation fitted to their enjoyment. Then he would come back and take them to himself where there should be no future separation. It is not strange that they could not understand. Twenty centuries of growing insight into these marvelous promises have not exhausted their meaning. God ever reserves the right to give us greater things than he promises. Our Christian hope today is vastly more comforting and rich than Jesus' promise to the disciples. But to have put our larger meaning into those words at that time would have been to leave the disciples comfortless and in despair.

THE WAY TO GOD.

They could only think of his departure in terms of a journey to a place somewhere else in the universe. Jesus tried to show them that it was not so much a place as a condition of life. Heaven is not merely a locality, but an estate in which the will of God is perfectly fulfilled. Thomas could not understand this truth. He was not a doubter but a man of fact. He had urged the disciples to go up to Jerusalem to die with the Lord if need be (John 11:16). After the resurrection he would demand the proofs of Christ's return to them, not because of his doubt but because he wished their assurance placed beyond question. Here also he wanted the facts confirmed and made clear. He insisted that they did not know where Jesus was going. How could they know the way? Jesus told him that it could be no roadway like that from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, but it was a way of life which could bring them to the goal he was pointing out. God could not be reached by a journey, but Jesus' way of living was a perfect approach to Him. It is not by traveling on earthly highhouse, but by making one's own the life that was in Jesus. The pure in heart alone see God. The peacemakers are the children of God and behold the Father's face. The poor in spirit belong to the kingdom of heaven and are ever in the presence of God. Since Jesus and the Father are one in spirit and purpose, those who knew the Master must know the Father also. "So," said Jesus, "you see you do know the Father." In the life of Christ He had revealed himself.

THE MYSTERY OF THE DIVINE MISSION.

But Philip also had his question, and it has been the cry of the ages; "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." So had the prophets felt even while they were seeking to reveal the Father to the nation. They yearned after fuller knowledge of the Highest. So had Job cried in agony because he could not find God, and there was no daysman to lay his hand upon them both. The disciples were entering the deepest mystery which the mind of man has ever encountered. To solve that mystery all the faiths have set forth their images of God. All the way from idols to ideals the nations have bowed down, but only Jesus has given us the likeness of God in terms of his own perfect life. He insisted that the words and works of God manifested by him were enough to prove the truth of his great claim, and the centuries are confirming his insistence. If men could not discern God's life in him they could at least see it reflected in his words of sympathy and deeds of love. Such a God was for the first time made known by him.

GREATER THINGS THAN THESE.

But the works of Christ are not completed in his own ministry. There were greater things to follow. It was marvelous that he should teach the ignorant and heal the sick, but how much more wonderful that he should inspire his followers with the passion for similar redemptive work and thus multiply himself a thousand-fold through all time to come. The believer does the work of Christ and more wonderful works than his, because Christ is not here in person to direct; and the believer, a law unto himself, yet subject always to the law of Christ, goes forth a free and happy servant of the Lord to finish the work which He began. He claims the divine blessing as Christ claimed it, and in him the Father is glorified and also the Son.

OUR HEAVENLY HOME.

The title of the lesson seems a misnomer. There is but a single passing reference to the heavenly home, as the house of many mansions. Jesus is not discussing in this conversation the future life, but rather the life of faith, trust and service which his followers are to live in the world. Yet this too is eternal life. To the Christian death is only an episode in a continuous life. The estate in which the believer as the child

The Prayer Meeting--Abraham's Intercession

Topic for May 6. Gen. 18:16-33.

Silas Jones

The noble spirit of Abraham is in striking contrast to the worldly minded Lot. The chief concern of Lot was for number one. That the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners against Jehovah exceedingly was not allowed to stand in the way of his material progress. He saw a chance for gain and he took it. He exposed his children to the corrupting influences of the city without giving them the stimulus of a heroic example of resistance to sin. Abraham not only led his flocks to the scant pasturage, he also remembered kindly the foolish man that had ventured into Sodom. He held himself ready to assist his kinsman at any time of need.

THE TIE OF BLOOD.

A man can not love humanity in general unless he loves some one in particular. If he despises his own flesh and blood, he need not expect to be taken seriously when he talks about his consuming passion for the rights of man. The world is justified in pointing the accusing finger at the reformer whose children are neglected. To say that Abraham sought to save Sodom for the sake of Lot is to speak in his favor. The friend of God was bound to show an interest in his nephew and former companion. Those who pray for the establishment of churches in cities where their children live, for the destruction of the liquor traffic that their sons may be saved, know the feeling of the patriarch in his prayer for the wicked city.

THE FATE OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

Abraham prayed to the Judge of all the earth, in whose righteousness he had perfect confidence. He was sure that the righteous God would make a distinction between the good and the bad. All true prayer is based on this feeling. Let the pagan try to buy favor of his god by torturing his body, by gifts of his most precious things; the worshipper of the true God relies upon the eternal justice. Whatever be the present fortunes of the righteous man, his fate is in the keeping of Him who will render to every man according to his works. Nor can it be said that in this world the good man is always in trouble, that his city is always ruined. The good man gets more out of the present life than the bad man. The calamities incident to the working of natural forces come to him as to others, but he escapes many sorrows that fall to the evil-doer.

THE HUMILITY OF ABRAHAM.

"I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, who am but dust and ashes." Abraham will not attempt to storm the gates of heaven. He realizes that he is talking to God, and that God must be approached with reverence. Kipling said of an American preacher whom he had heard that he seemed to be in the perfect confidence of his God, and he therefore freely advised the Almighty as to the direction in which the divine power should be displayed. Abraham knew what he wanted, but he was aware that his comprehension of the situation was incomplete. He could see only a few of the issues involved. Hence he felt that, after all, he might be asking for what ought not to be granted. Confidence in God's willingness to bless is essential to true prayer. The devout man has diserise which he asks God to fulfill. The prayer of the righteous is definite. But it is made in reliance on the wisdom and goodness of God.

INCIDENTS AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

A missionary in Matabeleland, South Africa, was examining a woman with a view to baptism. She had lost two children, and he asked her if she did not sorrow. She said: 'No, why should I? God took them to Himself; He loved them, and will care for them better than I, and I shall find them again in heaven, grown up all good."

In one of Ralph Connor's stories, a crippled girl cannot understand how God can be good and let her suffer so. She is told that just as her father stood by when the doctors hurt her so cruelly in putting on the plaster jacket, and loved her none the less, but allowed it in order that she might walk some day, even so God loved her though he had allowed her to fall and suffer.

It is not easy to keep a room sweet which is deprived of the sunlight. Business begins to reign where the light is not a guest. We need the help of the Almighty to keep the life sweet when the sunshine is temporarily withdrawn. Everybody knows the ill plagues that stir about us when life comes into the shadows. There is the pestilence of fretfulness, and melancholy, and murmuring, and despair.—J. H. Jowett.

THE MINORITY AND GOD.

Practically, the majority does not and should not rule, except as it excels in wisdom as well as numbers. In America just now the minority is dominant. So it is called a Christian land, though only a third of its people are church members, and they imperfectly Christianized. Every county has its poor farm and every state its asylums, though most of the voters are selfish. Every precinct has a free school and every western state a free university, though most of the citizens are careless of learning.

Being so trusted the Christians of this country are under a tremendous responsibility. No other minority has ever justified such power. We shall do so only by becoming the majority and—at last—the whole body. So we give the franchise to every man and an education to every child. But we must also implant the Gospel in every heart.

The religious task is not only the harder, but it lays a threefold exaction upon the minority, because they must bear its entire expense, whereas they are allowed to tax the whole population for education and public order.

Patriot heroes are those who rally for America's evangelization the first Lord's day in May. It is a day of prayer and fasting; a time for self-denial and heart-searching. Only as we rise to the occasion are we in the least worthy of the power we wield. The Christ leads on. "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." This is the Christianity of Christ that we have been striving for a hundred years to restore. Let the May offering show throughout this whole great brotherhood, "Man on the Cross; Christ on the Throne."

THREE GREAT THINKERS ON IMMORTALITY

The doctrine of immortality in a world to come has not in the teachings of Jesus the appearance of a fresh philosophical theory or of a new truth, kindling in him a constant surprise and intensity. It seems rather like unconscious knowledge. He speaks of the great invisible world as if it had always lain before him, and as familiarly as to us stretches out the landscape which we have seen since our birth. The assertion of a future state is scarcely to be met within his teachings: the assumption of it pervades them.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The mere moral history of Christ would have settled with us the question of futurity. For the great essential to this belief is a sufficiently elevated estimate of human nature: no man will ever deny its immortality who has a deep impression of its capacity for so great a destiny. And this impression is so vividly given by the life of Jesus—he presents an image of the soul so grand, so divine— as utterly to dwarf all the dimensions of its present career, and to necessitate a heaven for its reception.—James Martineau.

The message of Easter is not merely an assurance that Jesus is risen, it is the command to follow him. We may not stand in amazement before an empty tomb, we must "go quickly and tell the disciples." We may not stand gazing in joy at the place where where Jesus lay, we must follow him who "goeth before us." Not merely to revoice in the living Christ, but to go and tell others, and ourselves to follow our risen Leader—this is Easter's imperative.—Edward D. Gaylord.

HOW THE PUSSY WILLOWS CAME.

There was a flood long years ago,
  Or so the people say,
It rained and rained from dark gray clouds
  For many a weary day.

The cats and kittens ran and ran
  To find a warm, dry spot;
The large ones reached a mountain high,
  The little ones could not.

But, by a brooklet, as they passed,
  They saw a row of trees,
And, feeling tired, cold, and wet,
  They climmed up into these.

Each kitten found a little branch
  And curled up in a heap,
And, before many hours had passed,
  They all were fast asleep.

The storm it raged and waves dashed high,
  And then the kittens all
Were covered o'er with soft, brown mud,
  And looked just like a ball.

At last the storm came to an end,
  The sun shone from the sky,
The mud that covered up each puss,
  Became quite hard and dry.

And then small bits began to fall,
  Till one could clearly see
Soft spots of gray and yellow fur,
  As plainly as could be.

And by and by, out popped their heads,
  The mud all fell away,
And there sat pussies in a row
  Of yellow, white and gray.

And, in the meadow by the brook,
  If you should look to see,
You'd still find pussies gray and white
  Up in each willow tree.

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

ognize a resurrection which was in some true sense capable of interest. "The gospels assert this with great simplicity and delicate reserve." In the narratives of the post-resurrection appearances of Jesus there seems to be a wavering between the view that he was possessed of the same body as before, marked by the spear-thrust and the nail-prints, that he partook with the disciples of food, and called upon them to handle him, and see that he was veritably flesh and bones (Lu. 24:39); and on the other hand the view that the body in which he met them was of more etherial structure, capable of appearing and disappearing, as when he entered the upper room, the doors being shut, or vanished from the sight of the two at Emmaus; that it was capable of such change that they did not know him, as when he met them in "another form" (Mk. 16:12), or their eyes were holden on the way (Lu. 24:16), or they only learned after some moments that it was the Lord, as on the shore of the Galilean Sea (Jno. 21). But these views are harmonized in a measure by recognizing the spiritual character of the body in which our Lord rose, a body sufficiently capable of revealing his character, and therefore possessed of those stigmata which were evermore the signs of his redemptive work, at the same time elusive enough to be visible only to those whose yearning love made them one in spirit and purpose with their Master. Thus our Lord ascended from death and its limitations which spoke of mortal life, to the Father on the day of his resurrection. Of this fact his words to many are a hint. But for a brief space he appeared to the disciples, that they might secure gradual adjustment to his absence. The ascension of Jesus must be understood as an acted parable, to give emphasis to the fact that this departure in visible form was the last of the series, and that now they were to be possessed of his abiding spiritual presence. Thus the resurrection includes the ascension as necessary to its completion, and as the manifestation of that perfect life given for the world, and now completing its offices in the divine tasks of redemption.

COFFEE EYES.

It Acts Slowly But Frequently Produces Blindness.

The curious effect of slow daily poisoning and the gradual building in of disease as a result, is shown in numbers of cases where the eyes are effected by coffee.

A case in point will illustrate:

A lady in Oswego, Mont., experienced a slow but sure disease settling upon her eyes in the form of increasing weakness and shooting pains with wavy, dancing lines of light, so vivid that nothing else could be seen for minutes at a time.

She says:

"This gradual failure of sight alarmed me and I naturally began a very earnest quest for the cause. About this time I was told that coffee poisoning sometimes took that form, and while I didn't believe that coffee was the cause of my trouble, I concluded to quit it and see.

"I took up Postum Food Coffee in spite of the jokes of my husband, whose experience with one cup at a neighbor's was unsatisfactory. Well, I made Postum strictly according to directions, boiling it a little longer, because of our high altitude. The result was charming. I have now used Postum in place of coffee for about three months and my eyes are well, never paining me or showing any weakness. I know to be a certainty that the cause of the trouble was coffee and the cure was in quitting it and building up the nervous system on Postum, for that was absolutely the only change I made in diet and I took no medicine.

"My nursing baby has been kept in a perfectly healthy state since I have used Postum.,

"Mr. ———, a friend discarded coffee, and took on Postum to see if he could be rid of his dyspepsia and frequent headaches. The change produced a most remarkable improvement quickly."

The paper is a newsy, eight-page monthly which promises to be of much power in the promotion of a closer fellowship, and, where possible, actual union between Baptists and Disciples. Success to the Call.

The North Park Church of Indianapolis had special Passion Week services. A series of sermons was preached following the order of events in the last week of our Lord's life. There was a different preacher each night. The following participated: Chas. Fillmore, L. E. Sellers, W. H. Smith, A. L. Orcutt, and Harry G. Hill. The services were of great spiritual value. Austin Hunter is pastor of the church.

Pilar Silva, a young Mexican who has been two years in our school at Monterey, is holding a successful meeting at Coyote, near Las Esperanzas, the great coal mining center of northern Mexico. Eight confessions were received at the first invitation. The evangelistic work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in this part of Mexico is under the direction of S. G. Inman, who has recently moved from Monterey to C. P. Diaz, in order to be closer to his field.

AN EVANGELISTIC JUBILEE.

The scores of evangelistic meetings held in connection with Chicago's Y. M. C. A. Jubilee during the past week resulted in many professed conversions and drew renewed attention to the breadth of the association's work. In shops and churches, in association buildings and at colleges and railway stations hundreds of men were brought together. Though the multiplicity of meetings divided the total attendance, the interest was cumulative and the attention given the jubilee by the daily press indicates the impression made.

An important feature was the announcement of a $25,000 unconditional gift to the $1,000,000 jubilee fund by J. Ogden Armour. This makes $230,000 of the $600,000 minimum portion which the committee of one hundred seeks to secure within the present year.

Remaining features of the program are the members' dinners and foreign work luncheon on Friday, industrial work conference and physical work exhibition on Saturday. Special church services and mass meetings on Sunday, and the citizens' banquet which will be the climax on Monday evening, the 27th. Among the speakers will be President Woodrow Wilson of Princeton, Bishops Anderson and MacDowell, and Gov. Deneen.

The American Government.

We have just published a work entitled "The American Government," edited by H. C. Gauss, Esq. Mr. Gauss is a trained journalist at present occupying the responsible position of Private Secretary to Attorney General Bonaparte.

This book not only gives a list of all offices of sufficient importance to be filled by Presidential appointment and subject to confirmation by the Senate, but a complete statement of the powers and duties pertaining to each office, and the salary attached thereto. How many Americans are there who could tell precisely what the powers and responsibilities of the United States District Attorney or the Collector of the Port are, and the extent of power vested in the hands of Bank Examiners and the Comptroller of the Currency, and to what work of reference could they turn for full information upon these subjects?

This book contains information upon points of law, procedure and custom not known to many of even the best informed citizens. Not many know that the terms of the Postmaster General and the Comptroller of the Currency extend a month beyond the term of the President who appointed them, and that the Postmaster General, unlike other Cabinet officers, can be removed by the President only with the consent of the Senate. Few know that the United States Senators and Representatives have a right to select, subject to the passing of examinations, cadets in the Naval Academy, but have no such right with reference to the Military Academy, for which their selections are merely advisory, the President having the sole power of appointment. These and many hundreds of other facts as little familiar are brought out in this useful volume.

What American traveling abroad or contemplating going abroad but would gladly know the duties and powers of the American Ambassador and Minister, the Consul General and the American Consul: what their duties are not only to the Government they represent, but to American citizens who visit the countries to which they are accredited as well. Not long since a famous New Yorker lost a suit in the United States Circuit Court involving more than $100,000. He desired to appeal it to the Supreme Court of the United States, but was astounded at being told by his lawyers that they were not sure that he could appeal it, and to his astonishment the Supreme Court refused to hear the case. Now this book tells just what cases can be heard in the United States Courts and the jurisdiction of each court; and also covers all points likely to come up about the Government and its officials in all their relations at home and abroad.

The book makes a volume of nine hundred pages, bound in half morocco, and the price is $5. It is a book of reference for American citizens and for foreigners who desire full and authentic information as to the organization of the United States Government.

ILLINOIS.

Eureka.—I closed a very interesting meeting at Brownstown, Ill., last Sunday. Thirty-eight came forward. One was not baptized and one took membership with the Methodists. Most of the additions were men. The success of the meeting was due to the energy and consecration of this faithful church. Mrs. David Pileher, a faithful deacon's wife, presided at the organ, and led the music with great ability. She also abounded in good work in the field as did all the officers and their wives, and many more faithful ones besides.

"THE LAND OF THE DAKOTAS."

The first recorded act of worship on the Dakota soil was a prayer by the famous frontiersman and explorer, Jed Smith, then a boy of eighteen on the deck of the "Yellowstone" on the Missouri river, directly west of Aberdeen on the morning of June 2, 1823. The vessel was in command of Wm. H. Ashley, who was enroute to Yellowstone with a company of young traders, trappers and frontiersmen. They were attacked by the Ree Indians at the mouth of the Grand River and thirteen of their number were shot down. Gen. Ashley called for a volunteer to carry the news of the disaster to his partner, Maj. Andrew Henry, then trading on the Yellowstone. Young Jed Smith volunteered and, kneeling amid the dead and dying, forgot all theories of prayer and offered a soulful petition that moved his companions to tears and strengthened him for his hazardous journey.

The first sermon was by Stephen R. Riggs, who drove from Minnesota in 1840 and preached a sermon at Fort Pierre. "Father" DeSmet came as a missionary to the Indians in 1849. The first Protestant church was a Presbyterian, established by C. D. Martin at Vermillion in 1860.

The first martyr was Mrs. Noble, a Disciple, one of our own faith, who was carried away captive after the fearful Spirit Lake massacre, in Minnesota, in 1857 by Chief Inkpaduta. Her captivity lasted from March 18th, till May 29th. When a point about 25 miles southwest of Aberdeen was reached, Roaring Cloud, the son of Inkpaduta, became exasperated by her prayerful resistance of his brutality and beat out her brains with a billet of wood. During all her sufferings she cheered her fellow prisoners with prayer and song. The Tree of Life shall yet blossom in the land made sacred by her life and heroic death.

A great meeting has just been held at Virgin, S. D., by Guy L. Zerby, a boy less than 21 years old. About 73 took their stand with us. There were about forty baptisms. George Woodman was singer. Virgil is a town of about 100 population and the regions round about came to hear the word. The Harris family drove regularly 13 miles. Guy L. Zerby will be one of our foremost evangelists. He is kind to all yet true to the message. He is sane and spiritual.

Our State Evangelists, Lawrence Wright and Wm. J. Cary, have closed a fine meeting at Miller. The total results have not come to us.

G. Lolin Eaton, our new pastor at Hot Springs, has closed his own meeting with 36 added, 25 of whom were confessions. The S. S. has grown from 45 to 92 since his work began in January. We need more like him.

The work is looking up all along the lines. We need strong men now. Don't wait till the battle is fought then come stepping high, looking for something nice. We have Carnegie Libraries and automatic telephones and barbed wire telegraphy.

Remember the May offering and come to the help of the A. C. M. S., which is doing so much for S. D. at the present time. If you cannot send us some good men and a few dollars, send us an earnest prayer by way of the Author of the Great Commission.

A WORKABLE PLAN FOR THE MAY OFFERING.

In order to create interest in Home Missions, give the great facts to the people. Hold a Home Missionary Rally with your local forces, your Endeavorers or others. Let the time be the week before the offering or the day of the offering. Sing missionary and Christian conquest hymns such as "Onward Christian Soldiers," "Ho Reapers of Life's Harvest," "Work for the Night is Coming," "Stand Up, stand up, for Jesus," "America." Let the Scripture lesson be Isa. xl, or John 4:31-54, or Rom. x. The prayers are to be for America's salvation. Let there be special prayer for one of God's agents in this work, The American Christian Missionary Society. Following this prayer should come five minute speeches. See that they do not exceed five minutes. Cut off the long-winded fellow and the unprepared fellow whose rambling remarks lead nowhere. The following subjects can be presented: "The Meaning of this Rally—Christian America;" "Home Mission Problems;"

COME AWAY DOWN TO NEW ORLEANS IN OCTOBER.

We have all kinds of Christians, but few disciples. Many that claim to be born of the Spirit, but few that are born of Water. Our people are extremists; when they play they play in earnest, hence their addition to the American list of holidays Mardi Gras, a great jolly holiday with the dissipations of all holidays. Many that never read the Bible or think for themselves about eternity have wonderful faith in God, Jesus Christ and his mother Mary. Now, help us by your presence at the convention, to show them the result of a personal study and following of the New Testament.

'Tis a pity that the convention could not meet here now, as the city and country are blossoming like a rose. Much like the country where our Saviour lived, died and rose again. Fig trees spreading their beautiful branches and leaves with the small fruit that comes forth without a blossom. The grandest city in America, if we can lift the awful cloud of sin, superstition and ignorance of the gospel, and let the Son of Righteousness complete what God has given us with the hand of Nature.

If you cannot come, give us your love, prayers and good wishes for a great revival at the close of the best convention of all.

The graves grow thicker, and life's ways more bare,
As years on year go by:
Nay, thou has more green gardens in thy care,
And more stars in thy sky!

Behind, hopes turned to grief, and joys to memories,
Are fading out of sight;
Before, pains changed to peace, and dreams to certainties,
Are glowing in God's light.

Hither come backslidings, defeats, distresses,
Vexing this mortal strife;
Thither go progress, victories, successes,
Crowning immortal life.

A LIKENESS TO THE SAVIOR IN HELPFUL MINISTRY.

The whole brotherhood should rally to the support of the work of the Benevolent Association. To refuse to help care for the children and the aged is to acknowledge that very little sympathy and compassion dwells within the heart. Our Savior's compassion was shown in helpful ministry. This is the only way to indicate the compassion within the human heart. With many of PRIDE AND HUMILITY.

It is often true that the men who are proudest of power are those who make the fairest show of humility. The Pope, on one day in the year, washes the feet of twelve beggars outside the gates of the Vatican, and the Bishop of Jerusalem does likewise at the gate of his palace. There are other men who refuse all dignity and form of power, but are in reality as proud of their humility as the others are of their place. From all sins of this order Jesus tried to warn his disciples away. It was no mere form when he washed their feet. The truly great are always the simplest and most humble. They are unconsciously modest, not even caring enough for applause and power to deny themselves its gratification. A virtue never becomes so beautiful as when it ceases to be cultivated and becomes spontaneous. With Jesus humility was of that nature, and so would he have it in his disciples.

ORDINANCES.

There have been those, and there are such today, who regard these words of Jesus to the disciples as a direction to be followed by all who love him to the end of time. In obedience to what they regard as a solemn command they observe the ordinance of feet-washing in the church. No one can withhold from such Christians the mead of praise for an earnest effort to fulfill all the commands of the Lord. To them the injunction to wash each other's feet is as binding and persistent as the command to baptize seems to us. It is of course true that feet-washing was performed in the early church as a religious rite, and that not a few of our own churches practiced it, if not as an ordinance at least as a public duty, in the early days. But a better reading of the New Testament shows that it was no part of Jesus' purpose to impose external commandments upon his disciples. And to the very simple and impressive forms of baptism and the Lord's Supper it is unnecssary to add other ceremonies. Even baptism and the communion are valueless unless the believer rises from the level of mere formal and legal obedience to a perception of their inner and spiritual meaning.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handhook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

A SONG

The clouds are drifting drowsily,
The sea drinks in the sun,
And it's O, for the dawn that is dead and gone,
And the deeds I might have done—
Brave deeds I might have done!

The waning moon is red and low,
The slow wind brings the rain,
And it's O, for the night of dear delight
That shall not be again—
That cannot be again!

The crawling mists are cold and white,
The lights are blank and gray,
And it's O, for command of heart and hand
To do my work to-day—
Only my work to-day!

EDITORIAL

THE BELOVED PHYSICIAN

It is a favorite assumption of our Christian Science friends that remedies and physicians are only referred to in the New Testament in terms of reproach and prohibition. It is true that there are instances of this kind. The limitations of medical knowledge in that age must have made men the victims of much ignorant and harmful practice. Many unfortunate people must have shared the ill fortune of the poor woman who "had suffered many things of many physicians and was nothing bettered." But there was another side to the shield, and an interesting instance is furnished by Paul's affectionate reference to Luke.

A recent remark regarding this fact has brought a protest from a reader who finds no warrant in the text for the belief that Paul approved of Luke's profession, much less availed himself of his services as a medical advisor. As others may be interested in the matter, it is worth more than a word of reply.

The statement of Colossians 4:14 has been taken by all biblical scholars from the days of the church fathers until our own time at its simple face value. It calls Luke "the good physician" in the same natural manner that any man's profession would be described. There is no reason for questioning the genuineness of the reading. The only variation is found in the version of Marcion, who freely altered the text of the New Testament to suit his views. Otherwise from Augustine to Harnack the meaning of the passage has not been questioned.

The objection to the supposition that Luke was a physician who practiced his profession both before and after he became a Christian rests upon the purely dogmatic assumption that the practice of medicine was wrong, because Jesus gave the disciples the power to heal diseases, and tacitly condemned every other method of dealing with them. It is interesting to examine this view in the light of New Testament practice regarding things regarded as errors of the former life of the believers. If the practice of medicine as Luke had pursued it was considered contrary to the message of Jesus and sound Christian doctrine, it would of course have been disapproved by Paul and discontinued by Luke. That such was the case is the opinion of Christian Scientists, who attempt to find in the Bible the disavowal of all forms of healing by means of medicine.

It is very easy to test this matter by examining Paul's treatment of such practices as he regards as offences against the law of Christ. For example he names over a list of sins (1 Cor. 6:9f) to which he says the Corinthians had formerly been addicted. These sins include idolatry, theft, drunkenness, covetousness, etc. Of these unholy things they were guilty. Paul says, "Such were some of you: but ye were washed, but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God." Now is it conceivable that in addressing one of these men who had abandoned the evil life here named, Paul should have used the words, "Stephanus, the beloved idolator," or "Fortunatus, the beloved thief," or "Achaius, the beloved drunkard"? The absurdity of such a view well-nigh amounts to irreverance. The term, "the beloved physician," implies nothing less than that Luke was at the time Paul addressed him continuing the work which he had followed in the past, and with the full approval of the apostle.

It is evident that Paul's plans were changed by his sickness on the first missionary journey, and that he went to the highlands of Lower Galatia for reasons arising from his condition. To the Galatians he writes (Gal. 4:20), "Ye know that because of an infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you the first time." There is no reason to doubt that this trouble was a visitation of that malady whose recurrence in Paul's life he describes as the "stake in the flesh" (2 Cor. 12:7). Many references to sufferings, physical disabilities and limitations hint at the same "messenger of Satan." The probability that Paul was not unaccustomed to secure such medical assistance as lay within reach on occasions of this sort has been noted by nearly all his commentators. That such was the first cause of his acquaintance with Luke at Troas is not improbable.

But leaving all conjectures aside, we have explicit evidence that the apostle did not always employ special power for the restoration of the sick on occasions where such would seem to be the natural and expected method. When Epaphroditus, the representative of the church in Phillippi, came to Rome as the bearer of the offerings of that church to Paul, he was taken sick, and so serious was his condition that even the apostle was in sore perplexity regarding him, and deemed it the special mercy of God when at last he recovered. Why did not Paul heal him at once? And why did he feel close at hand the stroke that would add sorrow to sorrow? (Phil. 2:27). Here the limitations of even apostolic power to recover the sick are clearly recognized, on grounds of the lack of evidential value in such a work of healing, or for other reasons.

More than this, the New Testament bears explicit witness to the use of the medical means known in that age for the recovery of the sick. Now to speak of Jesus' occasional approval of the familiar remedies of the time in such instances as his anointing the eyes of the blind man (John 9:6) and the acts in connection with the healing of the dumb (Mark 7:33), the earliest of the gospel narratives in the account of Jesus' directions to the twelve when he sent them forth expressely states that "they cast out many demons, and anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them" (Mark 6:13). There are many evidences that the most common method of curing disease in antiquity was by the use of oil. It corresponded to the medicines employed by physicians today. The epistle of James directs the Christians to whom it is addressed to call for the elders of the church, in case one of their number is sick, and "let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord," with the assurance that such treatment would be effective.

It is apparent that the practice both of Paul and the early church included the use of such remedies as were known in that age, and that Paul's title of "the beloved physician" conferred upon Luke is not only consistent with the latter's continued pursuit of his profession, but requires that meaning to harmonize it with New Testament evidence elsewhere supplied. The implication of all the passages which bear upon the subject of healing in the earliest Christian community goes to show that while miracles were wrought for purposes of healing, the regular and recognized means of recovering the sick were not only employed but enjoined by the apostles.

It is a satisfaction to all the friends of education among the Disciples that Butler College has secured as president Thomas C. Howe, who has been for a number of years connected with its faculty as professor of Germanic languages. President Howe has had an excellent career as student and teacher. He is an alumnus of the college, graduated in 1889, an instructor and later professor in his department, an instructor in Harvard University and a doctor of philosophy of that institution, later a student of the University of Berlin, and finally Dean of the Butler College faculty. In his administration the best traditions of academic competence will be maintained. He is a young man of both scholarship and executive ability. We congratulate Butler College on this advance step in its history, and we believe every friend not only of that institution but of education in the brotherhood will rejoice in this admirable arrangement.

AFTER PROHIBITION—WHAT?

"You cannot make men moral by legislation." We have aptly answered: "But we can remove the pitfalls of immorality and give them a fair chance." Yet we must realize in all America the fact that Local Option and Prohibition merely clear the way for the positive and constructive work of the Gospel in making a new creature in Christ Jesus. Woe to the county, city or state that stops with casting out the saloon devil! The Savior's warning will be justified and ten worse devils will come in its stead and take possession!

The liquor traffic is such a tremendous evil, its overthrow is accomplished only with such mighty, united and persistent efforts and attention is so focused upon its evils during the struggle; we need not be surprised if the forces of righteousness show a readiness to rest on their arms after the victory is won. Nothing could be deadlier. It is like the minister who takes a vacation at the close of the successful revival. It is like the mother who abandons her newborn babe!

If there were no other ground of appeal and no other condition of need, the great continent-wide anti-saloon movement would of itself demand a Home Mission offering of a quarter million dollars this year. It is auspicious for the Churches of Christ that this movement synchronizes with our Centennial Campaign. "In the year of a hundred years," if ever, we shall be awake to our duty and alive to our opportunity. Let a mighty simultaneous response be made by every Disciple and every church the first Lord's Day in May.

W. R. WARREN, Centennial Sec.

Why We Ask for Money.

1. Because 68 millions of people in America are outside the Evangelical churches.

2. Because 10 millions of Romanists, needing a better gospel, are in America.

3. Because 10 millions of blacks, chiefly in the south, need the Church of Christ.

4. Because more than 20 millions of city people in the United States are "without hope and without God." In this connection remember that the Disciples of Christ have about 9 or 10 per cent of their strength in cities.

5. Because more than 10 millions of foreign born people are among us; 1,285,000 came last year; others are coming, and of a majority it is true that they have "a form of Godliness but deny the power thereof."

6. Because the mountains, frontiers, the new south, the southwest, the northwest, the Canadian west, call with twenty million voices for aid in giving spiritual care to the unchurched people.

7. Because our plea is at once peculiarly Scriptural and American. Its purity, simplicity, democracy, its call to unity is in harmony with the spirit of the land and age. It is the winning plea.

8. Because but about one person in seventy-five is America has made that plea his own, and because there is an abundance of room for 25,000 churches of Christ instead of our 11,000.

9. Because the American Christian Missionary society faces for our brotherhood, the major part of all the above tasks, and must do this work if it is done at all by the Disciples of Christ.

10. Because this organization has done well the work committed to her charge, having organized 3,400 churches and having aided fully fifty per cent of all our churches. Our missionaries have added more than 300,000 members to the churches, above 160,000 by baptism.

11. Because last year we aided 32 state boards in addition to employing our own missionaries. We organized about three churches per week and reported 14,700 additions by our workers.

12. Because having been true to our trust, you ordered us to do more work this year. This we are doing, having taken up more than 30 more points than we were aiding last year. We have appropriated $10,000 for work in Western Canada; we have further increased our aid as follows: New Mexico, $1,300; Alabama, $1,200; Georgia, $1,000; West Virginia, $1,000; Mississippi, $1,000; New England, New York, Louisiana, $600 each; Florida, $500; we have increased our aid to North Carolina, the Dakotas, Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Washington, Oregon and California. To meet these obligations which you asked us to assume, we must have more money.

This task is yours. You have asked us to do it for you. We are doing your bidding. But you cannot order the work done and refuse the means for performing it. We therefore ask in confidence for money—much money—much more than ever—on Sunday, May Third, 1908. We are doing a great work. Help us to do a greater.

If I Had Wealth.

W. S. Bullard

If I had wealth—it is perilous for anyone to undertake to say what he would do with large means—but if I had plenteous money, I think I would go into the supplementing business. I would help young men to get a right start in life, I would help them to keep themselves. I would encourage small groups of Disciples of Christ to organize, and build and secure worthy pastoral instruction and care. And so I would be helping to plant many centers of gospel life and light.

I once had a forest clearing nearly a mile long. The leaves and twigs of the "new ground" had been raked to the foot of the long slope, and lay ready for the burning. The season pressed—the sun was already high in the heavens. We did not start the fire at one end, and let it slowly feed upon green roots, and moist and dewey leaf. No! we caught up the fire and with it touched the long line here and there, and from the ashes of the old, in brief span of time, we saw the new life of sprouting grain.

If I had great wealth, I would help to send out one thousand men, who, with the cleansing fire of the Gospel of the Lord of "good and honest hearts," that, as one wide field we would look on the "new life" of growing stalks where roots are "hid with Christ in God."

And in this wish I am not alone. One hundred thousand of my brethren long for means to help bring in the kingdom of heaven. But of silver and gold we have little. What then, my brethren? There are many of us, and if we put our small sums together, would it not be the same as if one of us were wealthy, and gave his thousands? One hundred thousand times two dollars and a half; how much is that? It is easy arithmetic.

Ah, but even that may not be. No, I know it. Even that will not be. But there is the whole brotherhood and the "two pence" of the widow, and the dimes of our children, and the princely sum that consecrated wealth lays upon the altar, a sacrifice—a "sweet-smelling savor."

If all Disciples of Christ only knew, I am sure they would so feel the need, that the offering for home missions in 1908 would proclaim an acceptable year of the Lord.

Jesus Christ, would so prepare the soil

If I had wealth, and had started out in all good conscience to administer it, what fallibility I would show, what blundering attempts at adaptation I would have cause to regret, what mistakes I would make. But we have in our home board, men so trained now to their difficult task, that it is marvelous what they can do with a little money—men who, consulting the churches to supply their own lack of knowledge, almost always act wisely—and men who, with quickened conscience, heartily administer their sacred trust. I wish I had space to show the sweet beauty of a thoughtful care, that often brings tears to the eyes of the missionary.

Brethren in Christ Jesus, I wish I could speak this to you all, trust the consecrated wisdom of our board of home missions and in sums that shall represent a mission conscience, make the first Lord's Day in may a glory day for our greater work.

Correspondence on the Religious Life.

George A. Campbell

Many of the friends that know me best have been most kind in their correspondence over the widespread misrepresentations of my position. I thank them most heartily. I may at some future time publish something of the inner life of these last few weeks and try and trace its meaning to those most deeply concerned, but for the present I am concerned with the institutional side of our trouble. I have published in our local church paper the following statement in which I have tried to voice the sentiment of the Austin church:

It stands for progress. It believes each successive generation must emphasize the truths its time demands. God is as vitally concerned with the present as ever he was with the past. The gospel is ever the same; but man's interpretation of it is constantly changing. Each age has to do its own adjusting. Every vital age of the church has been one of readjustment. "Unhasting and unresting" has been the march of religious progress. So evident has been the upward tendency of human thought that we assert with confidence that, "God orders the March." Progress is born not of the destructive mind, but of the lover of truth who has the strongest convictions. It is not doubt but faith that has been the actuating motive of the men and churches that have led the world up to a diviner view of God and His world. To be a church that stands for progress is not to depart from Jesus but to return to Him. We need Jesus' view of God. We need His faith. We need His abandon. We need His courage. We need His sacrificial Gospel. We need his vision. His love of truth and of the simple life. To be a church that stands for progress is to have a passion to know and to follow not the Christ of the creeds, not the theological Jesus, but the real Christ of God and of Galilee.

SERVICE.

The Austin Christian church stands for service. There is much idle piety. It accomplishes nothing. It ends in its perfunctory mumblings and performances. It is busy with "mint, anise and cummin and neglects the weightier matters of judgment." There is today much enslavement to the church and its rituals as such. Activity is useless unless it finds proper direction. The Pharisees compassed land and sea to make one convert; but when they made him they enslaved him. They robbed him of his vision and human interest and made him a cold, unlovable legalist. His conversion only made him two-fold more the child of the devil. Any religion that make a soul less lovable and loving is a bad religion. Real helpfulness is the second half of religion. Good religion is not exclusive; but inclusive. It seeks to serve. "Faith, hope and love"; the greatest of these is love. When the church loves with the abandon of Christ and His early followers we will hear less of orthodoxy and soundness but witness within it more of God's power. We shall indeed try to make our church "a fellowship league of all who love for all who suffer." Our civilization has mighty problems of human relationship that await solution at the hands of a church on fire with the divine human passion of its Founder.

This church believes in man. Man is the object of service. Not simply in good men; but in the worst of them as well. "A man's a man for a' that." The church is for man as Jesus said the Sabbath was. The Bible, the gift of God through an inspired people, was given for man's uplift. More sacred is man than any institution. He is "a little lower than God." Our church bids him welcome. Every man is welcome. He that has no faith and he that has much. He that never prays—if there be such—and he who lives a life of prayer. All but the perfect man—he who needs no physician—are heartily welcome. We are not seeking to save the church but to save man—body and soul—the whole man. "We want not yours but you." Let us indeed be a friend to man.

"I see from my house by the side of the road
The race of men go by;
But I turn not away from their smiles nor their tears
Both parts of our infinite plan;
Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man."

In planning for the future of our church we wish to plan to minister in every possible way to every need of the men with whom we have to do.

THE CHURCH.

The Austin Christian church believes that the church properly used is a mighty agency of the Kingdom of God. It is easy for the church to become pharisaical, and thus really oppose the kingdom of Christ rather than be an agency for its advancement. The church, by its worship, teaching and various administrations is fulfilling its mission only when it makes Christ-like characters. It is no safety ark unless it is possessed by the Christian spirit. God does not regard membership so much as character. The church leading in the worship and work of the Kingdom should be a blessing to every soul. Everyone should have partnership in it.. Our master left two ordinances, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. The Jewish church was heavily encumbered with ritualistic requirements. Our Lord emphasized the Spiritual. Form to Him was nothing without the Spirit. He left only two ordinances. These are of value only as we fill them with His meaning. Faith in Christ and repentance of sin are the prerequisites to the ordinance of baptism which is an open and formal confession of the transition from the old life to the new. The original mode of baptism was by immersion. It is expressive and impressive. This mode we practice. Members of the church are immersed believers.

We regard the two ordinances as symbolic institutions to teach us some fundamental principles of our faith, and thus to help us to live better lives. They are outward signs of inward grace. Both should emphasize the surrendered life. They should not be held as hard legalistic forms but as vital expressions of a buoyant, spontaneous life that seeks fellowship with the Divine Master and comradeship with men who have dedicated themselves to the establishment of the Kingdom of God upon the earth. If any cannot be led to see that they should have part in either of these ordinances—they are still welcome in our midst as workers and worshipers with us. Believers in Christ who do not yet see it to be their duty to be baptized may be enrolled as members of the congregation. We are all disciples of Christ. Some have only followed a little, others have followed Him long. Some are weak. Some are strong. All are welcome with us. The church is a hospital for the spiritually sick. It is a school for the learners. It is a home for all. The Lord's Supper is for all the children of our Heavenly Father. All such are asked to partake of it with us.

FREEDOM.

The Austin Christian church stands for freedom. Stand fast in the freedom with which Christ has made you free: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make ye free." Freedom is the priceless heritage of our day. The line of oppressor and oppressed reaches far back till it is lost in the mist of history's early dawn. Every departure from the past has been sullenly challenged. The emancipated no sooner became free than they enslaved. Calvin drove the Romans out of Geneva only himself to become a Pope. Alexander Campbell's followers should ever remember that he was during all his best days breaking with the past. To stop where he stopped would be to be untrue to him. New times demand new adjustments of old truths.

"To think is to differ." There will never be a united church in which all the people will think alike. In the united church to be we will love alike. It is people who do not think that always agree; but not to think is to have agreement unto death. Think and let think is the way of freedom. Love is unifying—all differences ought to be held in charity.

We should busy our minds about the fundamentals of religion and not upon the trappings of formalism—and then there would be scant room to rob another of his freedom and scant chance to be offended by the exercise of his freedom. The church has no right to be an ecclesiastical dictator to a free soul. The church may teach but not compel. The way to God is open and direct for every man. We miss the New Testament way when we substitute the conscience of the church for that of the individual. Of those wishing to become members with us we ask not their opinions on controverted questions, we simply ask if they believe in Christ and if they take Him as their Savior. Our membership thus enjoys real freedom in Christ. We have no creed. To differ in opinions but at the same time to so love one another as to dwell together in peace and to work at common activities is the task to which Christ sets many today.

UNION.

The Austin Christian church stands for union. "That they all may be one," is one great object of our existence. Affiliated as it is with the Disciples of Christ our church has a passion for union. It believes that those in other churches are Christians; and that the work of righteousness can only be done efficiently when the great army of the Lord moves unitedly against the common foe, Sin. This union for which the Master seems to be breathing upon the church through our complex civilization of today will surely be hastened by the tendency today everywhere to combine. The church seems slow in learning the lesson that many other institutions of modern life have already well learnde. Before the mighty work of redemption petty denominational prejudices ought not to have any place. This is a time for broad vision and pure Christian passion. The evangelization of far regions, the redemption of our city slums, the effective reaching of the laboring classes, the abolishment of the organized evils of our time, the restoration of the church to power and prestige, the fulfillment of Christianity's two great commandments, all seem to await the coming together of the free and enthusiastic hosts of the common Captain of our salvation.

JOY.

The Austin Christian church stands for the joy of its Christian Faith. Life is God-filled. This world means intensely and it means good. It is no blot. God is real. Every evil is to be rooted up. No wrong can long prevail. God's ear is listening for every sob. Pain has its meaning. No night of agonizing is without its star of hope. No hour is Godless. The devil is insignificant compared with God. We have done his Satanic majesty too much honor. God is the only Almighty. He hears when we pray, and even when we are careless He does not forget us. The outcome of truth rests not with us. God planned the whole. He is building His church. It shall overcome evil. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is Death. He seems an awful blot on this fair universe. He is ruthless in his slayings. He is doomed. Every tear is to cease. Partings are to be no more.

The whole universe of God is to ring with a pean of joy. Already the fruit of the spirit is joy—the joy of love and faith.

Brethren, the time is short.

CHRIST THE CENTER.

The Austin Christian church places Christ in the center of all its activities. It takes its name from Christ. To it there is no other name like His name. He revealed the God that loves. He showed us how to love man. All his life was an example of the surrendered soul to sacrificial service. He gave us an ideal of the possibilities of man. By death He became Savior. He pictures God and woos man. He taught the Divine Fatherhood and created the human brotherhood. His cross is the way of life. His atonement is the breaking of God's heart and the making of man's. He saves from sin by love. He redeems by ideal. He was Teacher, Revealer, Redeemer. He is the Son of God and the Elder Brother. He is the foundation of this church. He is our leader, our Inspirer, our Guide, and our Reward. He exists not in hard rules, but is a living vital personal presence. He is the heart of the Bible. Without Him our Bible is but a book among ten thousand books. To do His will, to obey and humbly follow Him is our loving desire.

MEMBERS OF THE CONGREGATION.

After the position of the church had been widely misrepresented in the papers it was thought wise to make a pronouncement as to its exact position. Also keeping in view its local field where its work will always lie, it was thought wise to keep a record of non-immersed Christians, associated with us though not members, in somewhat more formal way than one had hitherto done. Just what should be the wording of a resolution authorizing this, and what should those so enrolled be called were matters to which we gave some consideration and over which I advised with some of our leading brethren. The most of our men who had given the matter thought favored "members of the congregation." At the Bloomington Congress I asked J. H. Garrison as to his opinion. He said that "members of the congregation" was liable to be misunderstood and that he favored "fraternal associates." Accordingly I recommended to our board that as members of other churches presented letters we call them, if they would not be baptized, "fraternal associates." The board

Teacher Training Course.

H. L. Willett

In accordance with the announcement made last week, the CHRISTIAN CENTURY begins in this issue a department of helps for Sunday school teachers. These will consist of outlines of Bible study, Sunday school pedagogy, Christian history, and such other themes as are essential to the work of the teacher with the class. Following the general statements made in the present study, there will come regular courses of instruction in the New Testament, then the Old Testament, and so on.

Extra copies of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY will be supplied to classes who wish to use these helps. Later they will be compiled in convenient form for class use.

LESSON 1—THE BIBLE.

The Bible is the book in which the Christian religion is set forth, as containing the revelation of God's nature and his purposes regarding man.

The word "Bible" is derived from a Greek word meaning "books," and refers primarily to the books of which the Scriptures are composed.

The Bible is divided into two parts, the Old Testament and the New Testament. The word "testament" means a will or covenant.

There are thirty-nine books in the Old Testament and twenty-seven in the New, making sixty-six in the Bible.

The Old Testament contains the laws, the religious instruction, the history and poetry of the Hebrew people.

The New Testament records the life of Jesus Christ and the labors and writings of his apostles.

It is the purpose of the Old Testament to show the choice and education of a people through whom the spiritual hopes of the world could be realized.

It is the purpose of the New Testament to show the fulfillment of these hopes in the person of Jesus and the beginnings of the church.

The authority of the Old Testament lies in the fact that it is the record of the providential history of the Hebrew people and of the laws and preaching by which they were directed. It is superseded by the new covenant or testament and is no longer of binding authority on either Jews or others.

The authority of the New Testament lies in the fact that it is the record of life of Jesus and the early church, and contains the teachings of Jesus and his apostles, which are the divinely given directions for the Christian life.

The Old Testament is inspired as the product of the Spirit of God working in the life of the Hebrew nation during a definite period and for a definite purpose.

The New Testament is inspired as the product of the Spirit of God working in the apostolic church to preserve a record of the ministry of Jesus, and to guide the life of the church in the first and all subsequent ages.

The Old Testament is valuable today as the record of the most direct method by which God prepared the world for the coming of Christ. Many of its teachings are repeated and enforced in the New Testament. It is, therefore, as Paul declared (2 Tim. 3:16), "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

The New Testament is valuable as the record of God's self-revelation to the world in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and describes the methods of Jesus himself and of his apostles in putting into operation his plan of living. It is the supreme religious literature of the race, and the authoritative text-book of the Christian religion.

"Man Was Not Born to Read."

Uses and Abuses of Books.

Baxter Waters

Emerson says: "Books are the best of things, well used; abused, among the worst. What is their right use? They are for nothing but to inspire." It is good to read, but it is better to think. Where there are thousands who read there may be one who thinks. Books are an inspiration to life. "Books are a guide to youth, and an entertainment for age. They support us under solitude and keep us from being a burden to ourselves," says one of the old writers. Paul exhorts Timothy. "Give attention to reading." It is important; much of happiness, mental development, culture and religious edification depends upon reading. Paul is addressing a young man just entering life's work, and his words may well be heeded by the young in any calling or profession in life. Reading has its function, books their power. Rightly used they inspire, uplift; abused, they clog the brain or arrest development. They may be as wings to bear us up, or weights to drag us down.

Let us try to clear away some of the errors of reading.

1. The effort to "keep up."

The mania to read the latest. This leads to rapid and indiscriminate reading and means the sapping of our physical and mental powers; it leads to mental dyspepsia and despair of soul. "Of the making of many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness of the flesh." Do not make this attempt to keep up with the ever increasing volume of books; in the first place it cannot be done, and is not worth the doing if it could be done.

2. Let us avoid the extravagance of expecting too much from books. "Man may be deep versed in books and shallow in himself." It is not all in books—life lies out before us. Books aim to describe or interpret life. Do not be a slave to books, or worm your way through other men's thoughts. Think for yourself, observe with your own eyes, trust your own investigations. Let books inspire. Man was not born to read, but to think, to know, to do and to act. Books are a means, not an end, an inspiration to help us see life more deeply and do our duty more intelligently.

3. There is no "reading virtue."

You will not be saved for your "much reading" or go to heaven because you have tried to "keep up." There is no virtue in the reading itself. It may be aimless, desultory, useless and to no purpose, mere refined idleness. Some have the time—how shall they spend it? In whist, bridge, smoking? or shall they follow the more dignified amusement of listless reading and of such literature that is trashy and insipid.

4. The abuse of indiscriminate reading; picking up anything that comes to hand, or books known to be even immoral. There are those most observant as to the friends they make, but careless as to the books they bring into their lives and homes. Books are companions, and we should use the same care in selecting them as in choosing our daily companions or friends about us in our homes. In many of these books "you receive the poisonous inhalation of bad men's thoughts."

But books have many noble and beneficial uses; we can not only a few of these.

1. Reading saves us from ignorance. The daily newspaper—every man's library—will bridge the chasm between ignorance and intelligence. The modern magazine will lead us out further into the field of information; the religious journal, along, with Christian periodicals, leads us into a high order of intelligence. These keep us abreast of the times. History gives the story of human life, science the classified knowledge; philosophy and poetry attempts at interpretation; fiction the delineation of human character; the Bible, along with its history and poetry, gives us the knowledge of God and makes us "wise unto salvation." There may be many other forms of literature, but keep these beaten highways of the world's knowledge and thought. If ignorance is a sin, surely in our twentieth century it is an unpardonable sin when you can secure the daily for a penny, the classics for a dime, a New Testament for a nickel, besides nearly every city has its libraries open to all. This is one of the distinctive glories of an American country that it aims to enlighten all classes of people—to disseminate knowledge and education among the lowliest.

2. Reading broadens the mind, gives us a larger conception of things. It deepens our feelings and convictions, confirms as by the experiences of others wiser than ourselves. Reading saves us from provincialism, brings down our pride and kills prejudice. The truth makes us free and sets our feet in large places, and books give us the distilled thought of many minds. "Reading maketh a full man."

3. Reading gives tonic to life's duties.

A poem of Tennyson or Longfellow or Browning, a Psalm from David or rhapsody from Isaiah, a chapter from the Sermon on the Mount or from John's Gospel, or from Paul's Epistles, how they lift the cares and sorrows of human life and thrill us with joy and stir us again to faith and hope. Or a great novel like "The Scarlet Letter" or "Adam Bede" stirs the soul and scourges the conscience back to the path of duty, or "David Copperfield" or Pickwick Papers" make life more real; and stories like those of Ian MacLaren or Barrie make home and friendship sweeter and holier. All of the great masterpieces of literature exalt virtue and put down vice; they exalt the best side of life—the good and the tender and the pure, the honest and the divine. On their pages fidelity and heroic self-sacrifice win out in the end.

They bring what Emerson says books should—inspiration. They tone up life and give us a firmer grip on duty. Let us be thankful for books, and with Charles Lamb, say grace before reading as before our meals. They bring joy and blessedness, companionship and rest into our lives; they lend dignity, culture and refinement, and by "the sacred writings we are thoroughly furnished with every good work." Yet man was not born to read, but to find in his books an inspiration to return to his tasks and duties with renewed vigor. Books are a means, a stimulus to study, to deep thinking, to plain living, to heroic deeds. To read is to gather into the store of the mind, to think is to cast the seed corn into the ground to make it productive. To read is to collect information, to think is to evolve power. To read is to fill the heart and mind with sap and energy, which under sunshine blossoms into the beautiful.

4. Reading gives purpose to life—not the idle, desultory kind, but purposeful reading produces a purposeful life. Put system, plan and purpose into your reading and study.

You read fiction? Then take up a great writer, say George Eliot; read two or three of her leading books, then her biography or a competent criticism or estimate of her work and message to the world; then read further as your interest may lead you; thus follow a certain period of literature on the great names of English literature, or spend your odd moments on Shakespeare or Tennyson or Browning for one winter, and you will begin to appreciate something of the grandeur and moral sublimity of her writers. Take a certain period of our American history; begin with George Washington, follow with John Fiske's "American Revolution," and see how your reading takes on purpose and grows in interest. You are interested in Christian missions; take a country like Japan or India and follow it until you become familiar with that particular field and its forces. Our modern world bristles with great problems—immigration, labor and capital, child-labor, education and sanitation, and all the teeming questions of science. Follow the bent of your genius and spend your spare moments on some one, or a limited number of these questions. One hour each day, or five hours per week, for a few years will give you an authoritative information on any branch of study; besides it will give purpose and dignity to your life, and it will develop and discipline the mind. I know a business man who has devoted part of each day to special study

Sunday School Lesson--The Comforter*

H. L. Willett

Among Jesus' final words to his disciples are found many references to the persecutions which are likely to befall his followers in the prosecution of his mission to the world. Similar had been his words of warning to the twelve when they went forth upon their preaching tour in Palestine. He had warned them that they must expect to encounter the wrath of those whose teachings, business interests or indifference to holy things were disturbed by the new evangel. Now at the end of his personal leadership of the disciples he felt it necessary to forewarn them again of this phase of their future experience. He had already insisted that they must not be troubled because of his own departure. He would come again and take them to himself. But in the meantime they must not be surprised if they had trouble with the authorities in church and state. Such would only be proof of the growing power of their message.

Jesus told them that he had not thought it worth while to discuss this matter much with them until this time. He had been with them in person, ready to counsel and warn them for their immediate duties, whatever they might be. But now it was different. They were absorbed in the thought of his departure, and found it difficult to give attention to any other theme. It is true that Thomas had said that they did not know whither he was going, and they could not know the way. But this only proved the more that they were interested not in his destination or purpose but in his departure itself. That had filled them with profound sorrow and apprehension for the future.

Yet it was necessary that he should go, and the best way to impress this fact upon them was to picture the coming of the Comforter, the Spirit of God, who was to take his place with them. This term, "Spirit of God," is used many times in the Old Testament. The growth of the idea was gradual during the period of prophecy. It represented those activities either directly attributed to God, accomplished by men under circumstances which bespoke an unusual degree of power. The spirit of God came upon men, so the records of the past affirmed, to give them strength for an emergency, as when Samson roused himself to slay the lion in his path. It was a long way from this conception of the Spirit to that which is suggested by Jesus' use of the term. In his thought the divine Spirit is the life of God resident in holy men and operating through them for the accomplishment of God's purposes in the world. Men have gone to fantastic lengths in attributing to the Holy Spirit such personality as signifies a being separate from the Father and Son. Hence arose the controversies regarding the Trinity which have been so profitless and misleading. One has only to understand something of the character of oriental speech to discern the value of personification when dealing even with abstract terms. It is not for us to assume full knowledge of the mystery of divine operations. But the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament requires no assumption of such personality as would lead to the polytheism from which it was the task of the prophets and Jesus to free the world.

It was no part of our Lord's program to remove from the hearts of his disciples the imprint of God's life which he had been successful in placing there. They must understand that the divine life in the world was a resident and persistent force, enabling them to accomplish the purposes of the Lord with true success. To describe such a spiritual power, the gift and possession of the believer, no words could have been so well chosen as those used by the Savior. He wanted them to understand that their relations with himself were unchanged, in spite of his departure. How could this be done so well as by promising them an indwelling guest or advocate who should lead them into the truth and interpret to them the facts of the true life?

As long as Jesus was with them personally they would wait for his initiative and accomplish little as messengers of the faith. His personal presence in the world was a limitation to the gospel. He could be in but one place at a time during the days of his flesh. His departure in the form of a human friend and associate would make it possible for him to abide with them forever as a spiritual presence and inspiration. This truth is sometimes forgotten by those who insist that an early return of Christ in bodily form is the only solution of the problems which now confront the kingdom of God. They forget that Christ disappeared from human sight precisely for the purpose of filling all his people with the sense of his spiritual presence. And wherever this is lost sight of in the longing for his visible return the emphasis is placed on a secondary factor in Christian progress.

The task of the Holy Spirit, this inward life of Christ in the soul, is to bear testimony not only of the earthly life of Jesus but concerning all the ideals of his kingdom in the world. Through the utterances and lives of those who are thus guided the Spirit convicts the world of its sin, of the righteousness of Christ and of that judgment which is the eternal condemnation of evil and vindication of good. Sin's most outstanding manifestation is the rejection of Jesus and his program. When persisted in it is the "unpardoned sin," that sin which has no forgiveness in this or any other life, so long as the soul remains impenitent and hostile.

The Spirit is the witness of Christ's righteousness, by the testimony which it gives, through the utterances of the first disciples of Jesus and all of later time, that he rose from the dead and resumed with the Father his timeless estate of redemptive service. His disappearance from among men, far from being the token of his failure, was the proof of his success, because his power was increased rather than ruined by what would have been the mark of failure in any other leadership. Again the Spirit bears witness of the judgment upon sin, because both the resurrection of Christ and the spread of his work in the world are the proof that the downfall of evil is determined and certain.

It is the task of the Spirit to bear witness of Christ. In the life of the believer the spirit of God keeps alive the remembrance of Jesus. The Spirit is not a person, to insist upon his own value. "He shall not speak of himself." The life of God within the soul is not obtrusive or boastful. It is the "still small voice" of an enlightened conscience; it is the quickened memory of the events which have made salvation possible; it is the vivid appreciation of present blessings and the glorious hope of the life to come. In all this the indwelling Spirit glorifies Christ by making his life an accomplished fact in the life of a child of God. And when God's life is thus repeated in the believer, Christ appears therein in the glory of his redemptive work.

This has brought him culture and dignity, a splendid library into his home, and it differentiates him from the common crowd which wastes the leisure hours. Purposeful reading means a purposeful life.

5. Reading saves from temptation. Good books keep out sinful thoughts, and temptations which come to the idle mind. Idleness is the great bane to good morals. Good reading is the safeguard to many a young man or woman. "I no sooner come into my library but I bolt the door, excluding lust, ambition, avarice and all such vices whose nurse is idleness, the mother of Ignorance and Melancholy." To be closeted thus in such a sanctuary for a season with the mighty prophets or poets and seers means the transformation of life and fortification of the character. In the hours of bitter temptation, Jesus appealed to a book, the truths of which had mastered his soul, and that book plus the Holy Spirit was his strength in that crucial hour. Such is the value of the Great Books.

The Prayer Meeting--The Militant Life

Topic for May 13. Matt. 10:37-39; Lu. 14:33

Oh, watch and fight and pray;
The battle ne'er give o'er;
Renew it boldly every day,
And help divine implore.

Ne'er think the victory won,
Nor lay thine armor down;
Thy arduous work will not be done
Till thou obtain thy crown.

For some reason we are often unable to sing this hymn with the spirit and with the understanding. We get the notion that religion should be a guarantor of undisturbed repose. We flee from the strife of the world to find peace in Christ and substitute for his peace a lazy acquiescence in conditions that ought to arouse all our fighting blood. Our Master bears the sword into every place where wrong is enthroned. His peace is the peace of conflict and arduous labors. It comes to him who works with God for the destruction of criminal organizations of men and for the banishment from earth of the sin that defiles the souls of God's children. There can be no peace, there can be no truce between the army of God and the hosts of evil.

"Go, Sell."

The god of material goods offers battle to the soldier of Christ. He says that life does consist in the things a man possesseth. The fight is all the harder because men must use the riches of the world. All the creation of God is good, but men have so long misused nature's gift that they have extreme difficulty in enjoying them according to the will of God. It may come to pass that the only hope of a man is in his renouncing his riches. That is the significance of the story of the rich young ruler. The Christian is not bound by a vow of poverty. He has a right to own property. But he must seek first the kingdom of God. No business transaction that involves a violation of the law of Christ is permissible to him. He controls his wealth and is himself controlled by Christ. If duty to the poor, if work of Christ requires it, he will give all that he has that he may be loyal to his Master. He fights down the selfish impulse.

The Greater Love.

It is easier to meet the open or secret hostility of an enemy than the bad counsel and the misdirected enthusiasm of friends. Those whom we love may make it hard for us to do right. Against the danger of turning from the way of life on account of entreaties enforced by natural affection Jesus gives warning in the seemingly harsh statement, "If any man cometh after me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." He calls us, not to neglect of father and mother, but to the supreme loyalty that sanctifies the ties of blood. He calls for men and women to live with the light of eternity upon them. So living, they will demand unconditional surrender of the enemies of the King of Heaven, and they will accept peace on no other terms.

Christian Endeavor--Christian Work and Play

Topic For May 10. John 5:17; Prov. 17, 22

A Special Message on the Topic.
By Eward Tarring in C. E. World.

Being a Christian is having a good time and enjoying life, at work as well as at play. Many people seem to have the idea that to be a Christian is to give up all the pleasures of this life. How often do you hear persons, especially young people, say, "Well, I will join the church after awhile; I want to have a good time first." Mistaken idea! Christians have the best possible enjoyment.

This past Christmas a Sabbath school in this city decided that every one at the Christmas entertainment should have a present, so when Santa Claus appeared and each name was called the present was handed out with the request that the package be opened. Sedate elders, ministers, and superintendents received rattles and whistles. Even the stranger was persuaded to give his or her name, so that Santa Claus presented them with remembrances. Everybody was happy, and I am sure that every one present could heartily say there is no reason why Christians cannot have greater enjoyment than others.

Let us be bright, happy, and cheerful at all times, and show the world that following Christ is worth while.

A Recitation.

Let the following poem by Rev. C. P. Cleaves be committed to memory and recited in the meeting.

Master of Life! beneath whose eye
The labors of all workmen lie,
Write Thou upon my book of daysetaoi
Write Thou upon Thy Book of Days
The work we render to Thy praise;
Gladly we know, whate'er it be,
That we have done it unto Thee.
Iron upon the anvil wrought;
Fabric of threads with colors fraught;
Product of clay, of wood, or stone,
By tool, machine, or hand alone;
In mine, or mill, or outdoor free,
It is acceptable to Thee.

Not for the wealth of cloth or gold;
Not bread to store for time untold;
Not ease and idle hours to win;
Not in the curse of ancient sin;
But in the joy of labor free
Our tasks are rendered unto Thee.

O Master Workman! who has toiled
O'er bench and plans, Thy garments soiled,
Shape in our hearts, in will, in mind,
That manhood by Thyself designed,
That we may know, may feel, may see,
That we are laborers with Thee.

Brain and Nerves Restored by Grape-Nuts Food.

The number of persons whose ailments were such that no other food could be retained at all, is large and reports are on the increase.

"For 12 years I suffered from dyspepsia, finding no food that did not distress me," writes a Wisconsin lady. "I was reduced from 145 to 90 pounds, gradually growing weaker until I could leave my bed only a short while at a time, and became unable to speak aloud.

"Three years ago I was attracted by an article on Grape-Nuts and decided to try it.

"My stomach was so weak I could not take cream, but I used Grape-Nuts with milk and lime-water. It helped me from the first, building up my system in a manner most astonishing to the friends who had thought my recovery impossible.

"Soon I was able to take Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast, and lunch at night, with an egg and Grape-Nuts for dinner.

"I am now able to eat fruit, meat and nearly all vegetables for dinner, but fondly continue Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper.

"At the time of beginning Grape-Nuts I could scarcely speak a sentence without changing words around, 'talking crooked' in some way, but my brain and nerves have become so strengthened that I no longer have that trouble."

Dr. and Mrs. Barclay were our first foreign missionaries, spening seven years in Jerusalem.

Miss Kate V. Johnson of Japan, who resigned as a missionary of the Foreign Society, some time ago, has been reappointed and will go out under the auspices of the Foreign Society in the coming autumn. She will be supported by the church at San Diego, California, this church having recently become a Living-link under the efficient ministry of W. E. Crabtree.

The Bible Schools of the churches at Bowen, Denver, Liberty, and Timewell, Ill., are in a fifteen-week contest, which began March 1. The points contested are: One, attendance; Two, total contribution; Three, punctuality; Four, average individual contribution; Five, per cent increase in attendance, and Six, per cent increase in contribution. Denver has the lead at last report.

The University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., took its offering for Foreign Missions the first Sunday in April, which exceeds $1,000. This is a healthy advance over last year. This does not include the Children's Day offering, which will be observed the first Sunday in June. C. S. Medbury, the minister, is making the University Place Church a great missionary center.

The annual Fellowship banquet of the Central church, Peoria, Ill., will occur May 15. Dr. Theodore G. Soares, of the University of Chicago, will speak on "Closer Relations between Baptists and Disciples." A unique feature of the banquet this year will be the presence, as invited guests, of members of the Baptist church. Harry F. Burns is minister of the Central church, William Price, pastor of the chapel congregation.

The Foreign Society has just received $1,728.68 from the estate of the late Miss Harriet Alice Geiselman, Wooster, Ohio. She left the same amount to the Home Society. She had not long been identified with our people. She united with the church at University Place, Des Moines, Ia., and upon the suggestion of C. S. Medbury, the minister, she was led to make these bequests. This incident should remind many preachers that they can induce members of the church to make such bequests.

Mrs. Belle M. Rice, the wodiw of C. Manly Rice, late pastor of the Island Christian Church, Wheeling, West Virginia, has published a collection of her husband's sermons in book form. These sermons are highly commended by E. B. Bagby of Cleveland, Ohio, Russel H. Conwell of Philadelphia, and others. Mrs. Rice is selling these sermons as a means of securing a livelihood for herself and her little girls. The volume sells at $1.10, and anyone who wishes to aid her can do so by sending a subscription to 156 East 79th Street, Chicago.

THE CHICAGO CHURCHES

West Pullman, Guy Hoover, pastor.—The church feels the effect of bad industrial conditions, but audiences are excellent. There were 77 in the Sunday school April 19.

Sheffield Avenue, W. F. Shaw, pastor.—One addition April 12, 200 in the Bible school. One young man of this church will enter the ministry.

Evanston, O. F. Jordan.—Revival services conducted by home forces have resulted in 18 additions in two weeks. 195 in the Bible school. The pastor gave his lecture on the Chicago churches in West Pullman last week.

Armour Avenue, (Colored), F. C. Cothran.—Excellent audiences and an encouraging growth.

Elgin, W. D. Endres.—Healthy growth in the Bible school.

Irving Park, W. F. Rothenburger.—One confession, April 19. Additions every Sunday. 240 in the Bible school.

South Chicago, A. J. Saunders.—Work prospering. Seventy in the Bible school.

Englewood, C. G. Kindred.—Passion Week was observed with special services in which the pastor was assisted by C. M. Sharpe, S. G. Buckner, and W. F. Rothenburger. 400 in the Bible school.

Hyde Park, E. S. Ames.—Sunday, April 19, there were eleven additions to the church and congregation. The Sunday school had special Easter services. W. E. Johnson, recently from St. Joseph, Mo., is the superintendent. The ladies of the church are resuming the Wednesday luncheons at the church this week. The Christian Socialists have been holding meetings in the church Sunday evenings.

Jackson Boulevard, Parker Stockdale.—Excellent audiences. 518 in the Bible school.

First Church, H. L. Willett.—Dr. Ames has been preaching Sunday evenings while the pastor is preaching for the Monroe Street church. May 3 the church will meet with the Memorial Baptist church on Oakwood boulevard, near Cottage Grove avenue. Dr. Willett will preach.

Austin, G. A. Campbell.—Nine additions, all confessions, at the morning service, April 19. Audiences filling the auditorium.

Monroe Street, C. C. Morrison.—The Sunday school is the best in the history of the church. Dr. Willett is preaching in a meeting still in progress. 250 morning audience, 400 Sunday night.

Harvey, S. G. Buckner.—114 in the Bible school. Four baptisms last week.

In Brief.

O. E. Tomes, pastor of the Englewood church, Indianapolis, Ind., and state Christian Endeavor president, was a visitor recently in Chicago.

The downtown services of the Central church in Kimball hall, were begun April 19. The number of Disciples present was encouraging to those who are pushing the enterprise. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind., was present as the preacher, helping in the new movement.

Remains in Chicago.

The Jackson Boulevard church is happy because of the decision of the pastor, Parker Stockdale, to remain with the congregation, refusing the call to St. Louis. In many ways the St. Louis offer was attractive and promising. The reception given Mr. Stockdale in that city was the warmest and his visit altogether delightful. But the success of his ministry in Chicago and the resultant enthusiasm of his people in the most loyal support of their pastor, coupled with the bright outlook in the life of the congregation, make it imperative that the present association of pastor and people be continued.

HOME MISSIONARY NOTES

A sister has sent us $1,000 on the annuity plan since our last notes appeared. We are receiving more annuity money this year than last. The plan grows in favor. Commend it to your friends.

Notices of several bequests have reached us. The sum of three hundred dollars from one of them has been received. Another will probably net us $1800 in the near future. Two others consist of an interest in farms which must be sold before the society receives anything. Remember this work of the Lord when you are disposing of your property.

This society, in common with some other organizations, has recently won two con-

A FOOD DRINK

Which Brings Daily Enjoyment.

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a stimulant, like coffee.

"I began to use Postum eight years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee which I dearly loved, made my nights long weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice from a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used "cream and no sugar," I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look—"like a new saddle.'

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years. I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like it in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous."

tested will cases, one in Virginia and one in Illinois. The former is not large but will sustain three or four workers for a year. The latter is probably the largest gift made by any individual to this society. Brother Thomas Bondurant, deceased, bequeathed to four institutions, this being one, his estate consisting largely in farm lands. Distant relatives contested the will, winning in the first suit and losing in the second which was decided but a few days ago. If this decision proves final, it will probably net the society some $75.000.

We look with hope amounting to confidence for the best offering May 3 ever received by the A. C. M. S. The interest in our work is more wide-spread and is deeper than ever. We have sent out more supplies and have received more pledges for the offering than in any former year. We look for a great increase. Help us to realize our expectations.

J. A. L. Romig, superintendent of missions in western Canada, has several evangelists at work in that vast territory. A large part of the time they are at work in Baptist churches. They do some work in the union churches recently organized. They will enter important towns and establish Churches of Christ. Several more churches are just now swinging into the union movement which is making splendid headway in Canada.

The Southeastern Passenger association covering all territory east of the Mississippi river and south of the Potomac and Ohio rivers, has granted a rate of one fare plus 25 cents to our convention in New Orleans next October. That makes the round trip rate from Cincinnati $21.25, a very low rate. Other associations will probably base their rates on that of the Southeastern. These favorable rates should do much to take a great throng to the Crescent city.

passed this recommendation and it stood a week. As we thought it over we conclude that "membership in the congregation" for us would be preferable. Some from other local churches were already working with us. Some, not members of any church, make public confession of Christ who take time to study the matter of baptism. Some remain always unimmersed Christians, though not members of any denomination. We wanted a record of these and also wanted them to continue with us as learners of the Master. We had already been misunderstood so that objection had little weight. Accordingly the board changed its recommendation before submitting it to the church in the following form:

"As has always been our custom, only immersed believers shall be enrolled as members of the church; but in order to encourage other believers in Christ who cannot yet see it is their duty to submit to this Divine ordinance to be with us as learners of the Master and to have part with us in His service and worship, the officers are hereby instructed to enroll such as 'members of the congregation.' This enrollment may be done after they have come forward in the usual public manner or after they have signed the following statement:

"Believing in Jesus Christ and wishing to work and worship with the Austin Christian church I request to be enrolled as a 'member of the congregation.'

"When members of the congregation leave us, upon their request they will be given a statement of their exact relationship to the church."

"Membership in the congregation" is different from "fraternal associates" for the latter are members of other churches but recognized by the Christian Church receiving their letters as Christians tarrying for a time with the Christian church, and worshiping with it. However the difference is not radical and "membership in the congregation" we think will serve our community better; and will be just as pleasing to the Master whom we follow. To some of us it is a new joy to feel, that although severely censured by some we highly regard, we have but a single aim, viz: To serve men as we think the Savior would serve them.

There is so much bad in the best of us,
There is so much good in the most of us;
It hardly behooves any of us
To talk about the rest of us.

WESTERN INDIANA NOTES

J. M. Rudy of Sedalia, Mo., is the new minister at Greencastle, where he succeeds C. W. Cauble, now in Palestine. Brother Rudy is a valuable accession to our ministerial force in Indiana and we heartily welcome him.

The Eighth District convention will convene at North Salem, May 4-5. O. E. Tomes, J. O. Rose, I. N. Grisso, E. E. Moorman, Carl Barnett, W. D. Headrick, J. M. Rudy, and others will be on the program. The North Salem church will prove a royal hostess. She extends a hearty invitation to the entire district to send delegates.

Melnotte Miller is succeeding well at Sullivan. Besides conducting a very successful meeting with nome forces he recently held a meeting for the Jacksonville church, having one hundred additions and doubling the membership. A splendid house of worship was recently dedicated there by L. L. Carpenter. Much credit is due to the heroic work of J. C. Ashley and wife, who have been laboring there for eighteen months past.

Fontenet recently reopened her church home for the first time after the dread explosion there about eight months ago, when the church and many of the homes were completely demolished. The Dupont Powder company have made possible this rebuilding so soon. L. V. Barbrie had charge of the reopening services.

David Walk, the veteran preacher of Indianapolis, has been filling engagements for the Martz, Beara, and Fontenet churches recently.

L. E. Sellers says that "teacher training" is the greatest thing that has ever come to Terre Haute. About one-third of his large membership is enlisted in classes conducted by himself and Mrs. Sellers, who is also an enthusiast. Brother Sellers will soon assist H. D. Smith of Hopkinsville, Ky., in an evangelistic campaign for the second time.

Twelve persons have recently been added to the Brazil church. Eight of these were baptisms. Brazil has two teacher training classes with an aggregate enrollment of nearly 100. The largest attendance and offering in the history of the Bible school was on Easter Sunday, when 503 were present and more than $93 was the offering. A beautiful Easter cantata was rendered by the school at night. Banner audiences characterized the day.

Brazil is rejoicing over the successful outcome of a blanket saloon remonstrance campaign. The work was so planned and organized that the four wards of the city were carried in about four days and forty-two saloons were affected. The whole of Clay county, outside of Brazil, had previously succeeded in this remonstrating against the saloons and made our task easier. The saloon powers were very much surprised and chagrined at the result. They are dying hard but we believe our remonstrance will hold in every ward. All the Protestant churches united in the campaign and to them belongs the glory. The men of the Christian church stood by the fight splendidly.

And knows that Heaven answers in return.

I tread the path of mortals here below;
But here and now,
The thorns, which hedge me in, are made to bloom,
And flowers of hope on desert places grow,
I know not how.
A light, moreover, lifts the distant gloom,
And what is now my strength I thought my doom.

A power not my own doth shape my end.
I seem to be Within the loving grasp of Wisdom's will;
The good and ill, the lights and shadows blend
In harmony,
And where I least had hoped, I find that still
The Unseen, somehow, doth the present fill.

And when thro shifting tides and lowering clouds
And hidden shoal,
I launch upon the vast and darksome deep;
When that, at last, which solemnly enshrouds.
The helpless soul
Shall o'er my drifting, fragile life bark sweep,
Ah, then, I'll trust Him still His child to keep.

TO THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN ILLINOIS

DEAR BRETHREN:—The next state convention of the Disciples of Christ is to be held in this city the first week in September. The churches of Chicago fully appreciate the honor conferred upon them in this choice of the convention city, and at the same time are conscious of the responsibility placed upon them, in view of the splendid conventions of recent years, culminating in the great gathering at Jacksonville.

Chicago entertains many conventions in the course of a year, but while there will be several other religious gatherings here during the season, we believe that none will be more important, and we trust none larger, than our own. It is seldom that our people have an opportunity to make any impression on this city. We hope to be able to do this with the state convention this year.

The sessions will be probably held, for the most part, in the Jackson Boulevard church, of which Parker Stockdale is pastor. But plans are being made to hold some of the sessions in even larger and more central quarters. A great men's meeting, we hope the greatest in the religious life of the state, will be one of the features of the convention. The program throughout will be worthy of the event.

The churches of Chicago are completely and enthusiastically united in the effort to fulfill their part in the promotion of of the convention. Their entertainment of the delegates and visitors will be open-hearted and generous. They unite in an urgent request that every church throughout the state send its minister and as many others of its members as possible. The convention falls in one of the most delightful months of the Chicago year, and in addition to the formal program, several features of special interest will be provided to add to the enjoyment of the occasion.

It is not too early to plan for attendance at the convention. Both as those who have the welfare of the meeting at heart, and as those who believe that the Disciples of Chicago will do their utmost to make pleasant and profitable the visit of their brethren from other parts of the state, we join in this earnest word of invitation to all the Illinois Disciples to attend the Chicago convention in September.

J. FRED JONES,
State Secretary.
PARKER STOCKDALE,
Pastor Jackson Boul. Church.
HERBERT L. WILLETT,
President of Convention.

The Very Latest.—"Let me see some of your black kid gloves," said a lady to a shopman. "These are not the latest style, are they?" she asked, when the gloves were produced.

"Yes, madam," replied the shopman; "we have had them in stock only two days."

"I didn't think they were, because the fashion paper says black kids have tan stitches, and vice versa. I see the tan stitches, but not the vice versa."

The shopman explained that vice versa was French for seven buttons, so she bought three pairs.—Detroit Free Press.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo.. one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Whatever is wrong in city or nation, it is our Christian business to set about making right. Whatever churches or organizations ought or ought not to do, there can be no question what Christians ought to do. They ought to fight the saloon to the death, they ought to overthrow graft and corruption, they ought to force honesty and economy into all the finances of the Government, municipal, state, and national. They ought to insist on clean streets and efficient fire departments, and honest police administration. They ought to stop gambling. These, and a score of things besides, Christians ought to do and can do whenever they rise up and do their duty. —Robert E. Speer.

Did the thorns, Maid-mother, mild,

Softly kissed your cheek benign,

A RAILROAD MAN'S KNOCK.

"That famous railroad man, the late Samuel Sloan," said a New York banker, "loved fast trains and hated slow ones. They tell a story about a trick he once played on a railroad whose service was notoriously slow.

"Having, several times, to use this railroad's afternoon accommodation, he caused a sign to be painted, which he took from his pocket and hung in front of one of the cars when nobody was looking. The sign said: 'Passengers are requested not to pluck flowers while the train is in motion.'"

EDITORIAL

THE RECRUITING OFFICE OF THE MINISTRY.

In nearly every city may be seen at some central place, usually the postoffice or custom house, a sign, "Young Men Wanted for the Army." It is the imperative necessity of the service that constant efforts be made to enlist new men in the military department of the government. The losses are constant, some from death, some from expiration of term and some from desertion.

The ministry of the gospel is a division of the army of our Lord for which new recruits are continually needed. The causes of this need are far more numerous than is the case in the army. To be sure men are not supposed to enlist in the ministry "for a term of years." Few men would be justified in entering the sacred calling on such a condition. "In that war there is no discharge."

But there are deserters, as in the case of the army. Men are giving up their work for other activities. In some cases this change is justified, and in some it is better for the ministry itself. In every case the individual who makes the change from the ministry to a secular work finds a way of excusing his conduct, no matter what the need of his labors in the ministry may be.

Then there are inevitable losses by death. Every week brings its own toll from the tribute-tables of death, where time waits to levy the dues of the years. In this list are men who have been living witnesses of the truth for many days. They have borne the burden in the heat of the day. They rest from their labors, and their works follow them. They have their reward already in the glory of the service and the joy of moulding characters who rise up to call them blessed. No life is so full of the joys as well as the sacred sorrows of the saints as that of the minister.

But there is need of strong men in the ministry not alone to fill the gaps in the ranks and to take the places of those who will soon cease their work, but young men are demanded to make new places for themselves in an enlarging field of Christian service. They are needed to guide the thinking of an age which is not indifferent to religion, but wants its questions answered by men who know and not by those who have no message but that of another age. They are needed to open and develop the teaching and training side of Christian work, which is coming into such importance. They are needed to plan in a large and statesmanlike way for the future of cities now growing up, and of states and territories now in swaddling bands.

For these and many more activities the Christian ministry needs a host of strong young men. It is too late in the centuries for the weak men to take up this work with hope of success. Time was when a man was led to choose the ministry because he gave promise of success in nothing else. "O John, you are so slow." said a small boy to his brother in their play; "You'll never make a farmer in the world. You'll have to be a preacher." And they were the children of a minister! That time has gone by, and happily quite gone by. The ministry, like Saul of old, is looking for mighty men and valiant men, that it may take them to itself. Like Frederick the Great it wants men who have the stuff of grenadiers in them.

Where is the recruiting office for the ministry, and who is the recruiting officer? Manifestly, the church is the place and the minister is the man. If the officers of the army have no concern for new recruits, who may be expected to think of the matter? The preacher is charged with no task more impressive than that of enlisting strong young men as candidates for gospel ministry. If the success of a preacher is to be judged by the number of new lives which he turns to Christ and effectively trains for Christian service, still more is it to be estimated in value by the number of young men he secures for the ministry.

Would it not be a sore disgrace for a pastor to go through a year's work without preaching once upon the call of the cross to young men of power and consecration? Without laying upon the hearts of his people the privilege and duty of consecrating their sons to this supreme task? Without having the personal satisfaction of gathering about him a little group of young men whose hearts the Lord had touched by his ministry? Without abiding much in prayer that his own sons, as well as those of his people, might enlist in this high service?

To recognise this as one of the most important parts of his calling, and to fulfill year by year the obligations of a recruiting officer in the Church of God is to know both the largest service and the deepest joy that can come to a servant. of the Lord.

THE SECOND CENTENNIAL AND CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

While we are rounding up the May offering for home missions and gathering in its aftermath, let us give heed to the call of H. A. Denton, Centennial Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society. There is a chance to repeat and multiply the Oklahoma victory on a grander scale. Other offerings are so preempted by other work that this conquest depends solely upon the Christian Endeavor societies. Let every one study the field, observe the day, and make the offering.

Our sincerest praise of those who entered the doors of a hundred years ago is in entering the doors of to-day. Let us give warrant for a second centennial.

UNION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES.

A. L. CHAPMAN.

"Our fathers undertook this work when the prospects of success were not nearly so bright as they are today. Two generations have come and gone since the separation of the Baptists and Disciples. The differences between us are not so marked as in former years. The great combinations in the business world are teaching us the folly and the disadvantage of divisions in religious efforts. The whole Christian world is praying for union today as they never prayed for it before. Divisions are condemned everywhere, so that today it is difficult to find a representative man in any denomination who will commend the present divided state of the church. The church is living in a different atmosphere from that of seventy-five years ago.

"We are learning to place greater emphasis upon life, character and good works and consequently less emphasis upon matters of doctrines. Today we find these two bodies of Christians closer together in doctrines and sympathies than ever before. This taken together with the growing sense of the sin, weakness and scandal of the divisions among religious forces, and the mighty trend of things in the direction of union among Christians makes the agitation of the reunion of the Baptists and Disciples most timely and full of promise.—From a recent sermon in the First Christian Church, Seattle, Wash.

The Church and Men

Arthur Holmes

The statements of ministers and church workers make it unnecessary to prove that men attend church but little. The fact that women attend more than men might lead one to suspect that the cause of this condition lies in the temperament of women and the suitability of church services to them. This is partially true. The greater cause, however, seems to lie in the present social and economic system.

Roughly, the worlds of men may be reduced to that of employer and employe.

The former is individualistic in motive, competitive in method and materialistic in ideal. The business man is after a fortune. He gets it by outstripping his rivals. He measures his success in terms of dollars and cents.

Such a world develops a man who can find no satisfaction in the Christ ideal. He sees no possibility of establishing the Kingdom of God—altruistic in motive, cooperative in mind, spiritual in ideal—in this world.

Therefore, the majority of employers do not attend church. Some, of course, are bred and brought up in it. These latter find the actual church quite a different institution from the brotherly Kingdom of God. They find themselves in an organization whose problems are precisely like their business problems. They fit in. Offices come their way. They direct the polices of the church, order its services, furnishings and teachings.

As a result this class of men, responsible in the public mind for gigantic steals and for oppression of the poor, appear also to the popular mind to be masters of the church. Hence, the masses are turned against the church because it does not denounce such members, while a majority of the employers are not attracted to the church because of the passive ideals of Christianity.

The economic world of the employe is like that of the employer except it is on a lower plane. His social world has been studied very diligently. His pyschology has not been understood nor described. Scientific investigators have been able only to make believe and consequently missed the real feeling of a man confronted with life-long imprisonment in terribly in earnest struggle for a livelihood.

Three mental states of the workingman are important in connection with this problem of church attendance.

The first is his pride. He is proud of his physical strength, manual skill and the concreteness of his material achievements.

His second characteristic is his egoism, or longing to individualize himself. Such a longing feels a rude and disheartening shock from the method of modern production wherein the man becomes merely a number and economic factor, a means to an end. Frequent schemes bearing prima facie evidence of treating him as a man, have turned out to be mere tricks to increase his capacity to do more work at the expense of his privileges. This has developed in him a suspicion of all philanthropic endeavors for his welfare.

A third point is his ambition. He deems it an American birthright to get rich, and an inherent right to make a living by work. He finds the first reserved for a few, and the second possible only to about fifty per cent of the toilers. He lives in the best times only two weeks from destitution. Hard times drive him to what he hates above all else—pauperism.

For him the church has little to offer. Its social life is strange to him. It is dominated by the men who exploit him. Its chief material aid is in the form of charity, which he hates worse than death. It preaches passiveness and gives his individuality no opportunity to express itself. Its theology only adds to the weight of a soul already breaking with the sense of manifold and constant injustices. It teaches the easy escape from consequences of sin through the death of his greatest Friend, assuring neither justice here nor hereafter. It promises him nothing but a pale and passive distant—far distant—"heaven."

Under the circumstances what is the church to do to get near to men?

First; let the teaching of a personal salvation go on; second, let the church adopt the exceedingly radical and revolutionary ideal of establishing the Kingdom of God on earth. Let her urge the Golden Rule as valid in all activities in life. If this brings her in opposition to the fundamental economic principle of individualism, let her cease attempting to trim the eon-old first rule to suit the century-old second one. Such a vision, once comprehended, will immensely enlarge and enrich the activities of the church and demand altogether new and vigorously masculine duties of her ministers.

The methods of gradually bringing the church into this new relationship might begin with the co-operation with the Y. M. C. A. in holding the adolescent boy by means of affiliated clubs for all-round development.

The club, or group idea, can be extended to men. Such a method obviates the insane striving for mere numbers; permits organization for limited periods; allows consideration of subjects interesting to only a few; makes use of voluntary workers, the average man, and enables the church to carry its activities to places and conditions where men live and are interested even outside of its building.

In general, the church should face the future with a determination to become the dominating factor through persistent teaching and unselfish service, in reconstructing the kingdoms of this world until they shall indeed become the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Disciples and Their Centennial

IV. The Plea.

P. J. Rice.

Many difficult problems were destined to present themselves which Mr. Campbell does not seem to have foreseen, but so far as we can know he followed unflinchingly the principles he announced and defended, though it led him often into paths that were new. At the time of the writing of the Declaration and Address he was a pedo-Baptist in belief and practice. The question regarding baptism arose when his son, Alexander, reading the proof sheets of the Declaration and Address, came across the statement that nothing would be regarded as a matter of Christian faith or duty for which there could not be produced a "thus saith the Lord, either in express precept or approved precedent." It was suggested that such a principle would involve the giving up of infant baptism, and while Mr. Campbell was unwilling to concede it at the time, he frankly declared his willingness to be true to the principle and to follow its leading. It was some years before either the father or the son were immersed.

Other questions have arisen at various times in the progress of the movement which have involved long and sometimes bitter controversies. In every instance the principles at first announced have been tested, and thus far they have stood the tests. At every turn there have been numbers who have been afraid to follow, but the integrity of the movement has been, and doubtless will be, maintained. Union on any other platfrom is impossible. Strict adherence to the interpretations of the past, fidelity to the doctrines of the fathers, is not the way to union; but rather an open and determined purpose to follow where truth may lead, even though it points to untrodden paths. Every generation has its own peculiar way of stating its convictions. In some particulars every generation breaks from the one preceding it. Sometimes this divergence is much more noticeable than at others, but the change is constantly going on, and no man nor set of men, no creedal statements nor dogmatic assertions can possibly prevent it. The only other alternative is for the mind of man to become inactive and stagnant, which would be deplorable indeed. Union is possible only in an atmosphere of such freedom as will permit such changes, without a violent shock such as comes from the revision of creedal formulations. This is essentially the unique feature of the Disciples' program.

By adhering strictly to the principle of the unity of faith, that is, faith in Christ, defined by each individual, as he must be in any case, we are able to enjoy a degree of freedom in the large field of so called "non-essentials," otherwise impossible. The corrective forces of fraternity and service have been and will be sufficient to prevent any rank individualism that otherwise might appear. Love must be the uniting bond between men as it is between God and men. If this seems to grant too great liberty we have to reply that during a century of history the Disciples, following this general program, have witnessed the fewest possible departures from the great body of evangelical doctrines which have become the possession of well nigh the whole church. Our difficultics have arisen in nearly every case from the recoil and reaction of men and institutions from this broad, high position, and these have not been either serious or numerous, however threatening they appeared to be at the time.

In the present stress of change, which is being felt in all the churches, there is naturally present among us, as among others, the conservative element which shrinks from what seem to be the vague uncertainties of the new in contrast to the tried and tested certainties of the old, and it is well that it is so. It would be foolish to run off after every new wind of doctrine that blows, as some doubtless would if it were not for the check that is put upon them by the more cautious. Each element must help to correct the other's tendency to extremes, and the possibility to do so lies in a strict adherence to the maxim of the fathers.

Herein, also, lies the hope of union. When all peoples shall be able to recognize that it is possible to be true to Christ and to the Scriptures, and still to hold divergent doctrines, we shall be free to work together and to live together as we never have been. In the fraternity of service, in the fellowship of suffering and in the patience of hope, we shall be able to arrive at a mutual understanding far more perfect than could ever be possible in an atmosphere of self-assertion and controversy. We believe that even now the points of agreement are far more numerous than the points of difference, and it is altogether probable that if we could sit down together with the definite object before us of discovering each other's inmost thoughts, often hidden beneath a guarded exterior and misunderstood words and sentences, we should be surprised to find how much more we have in common than we are now able to perceive. It is impossible to believe that people who read the same divine Word, believe in the same divine Savior, pray to the same God and Father and sing the same hymns of love and praise can be very fundamentally divided in thought and feeling about the deepest things of life.

Every sign of times points unmistakably to the speedy coming of the union for which the Disciples have continually pled The end may be near. Great movements have a way of making slow progress through weary years, and then with surprising suddenness coming to their fullest consummation. It seems to be so with the temperance movement, and there are not wanting signs which indicate the same speedy triumph of the movement for the union of Protestants. The situation is full of promise, and the interest everywhere is intense. The Disciples have every reason to rejoice and to press the plea with redoubled energy and enthusiasm.

Palestine the Providential Land

Frank M. Dowling

The profoundest impression made upon my mind during my visit to Palestine as a member of the Palestine Study Class of the University of Chicago, next to the reality of the facts underlying our holy religion, was the geographical fitness of the land to be the home of the people whose mission was to give to the world a universal religion. The more extensive and intimate is any one's knowledge of the Holy Land the more the land of promise becomes to him the land of providence.

Whoever believes that this is God's world and that God is in his world will probably believe that all lands are providential lands, and that God's hand is in the history of all peoples. He will not find it inconsistent with this faith to believe that, for the sake of all, special nations have been called and qualified to render special services. In all such cases the divine word has been "in thee and in thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed." Of all such providences, the most manifest is the selection and preservation and preparation of the nation of Israel for the high mission of giving to the world its final, most spiritual and universal religion; and nowhere in all God's dealings with the chosen people are his providences more unmistakable and impressive than in the selection of the land to which they were guided and in which they were settled.

A study of the geography and history of the ancient world will leave no doubt that, far beyond any other locality on the face of the globe, Palestine furnished the necessary and unique conditions for the training of the people whom God was to entrust with a world-wide spiritual mission. The chief of these conditions were these two, which, at first thought, seem paradoxical and impossible: separation from the world and contact with the world. God must have a people by themselves and to himself if he is to train them for a special mission, and that the highest and holiest if he is to manifest himself to them in a peculiar manner, if he is to train their ears to hear his voice, their eyes to behold his presence, their consciences to be sensitive to his will, their minds to be open to his truth, their hearts to be the places of his abode. And he must have them, too, where they can hear the far, deep cry of the world, and where they can see and know the peoples whom they are to serve.

It will now be our task to consider these seeming mutually exclusive conditions and see if it be possible, if it be a fact that the land of Palestine supplied them both as no other land could have done.

Our first innquiry then will be, What is there in the geography of Palestine that furnished to its inhabitants isolation from the world?

In answering this question, it is of first importance to bear in mind the remarkable division of the land into mountain and plain. The people of Israel were a mountain-people. They lived on the heights, and in their high homes they dwelt apart from men. From the beginning of their conquest of Canaan their eyes were unto the hills whence came their strength. The Jews were hill-dwellers, and, because of the striking division of their land into mountain and plain, they lived remote from the tides of the world's life that surged through the low lands beneath their high home.

All that is commonly said about the seclusion of mountain peoples may be said about the Jews and much more. One cannot appreciate the isolation possible to the Jews until he has looked upon and felt the presence of those "borders and bulwarks of Judea" which so completely cut off this portion of the land from the surrounding plains, that the picture-forming mind of George Adam Smith sees Judea rising from the encircling lowlands as an island rises from the sea; and Judea, it should be borne in mind, was the home of the real, the unmixed Jew. This was the part of the land from which, significantly enough, the entire race derived the name of the Jews, which was destined to supercede the ancestral name of Hebrews as well as the name that did honor to their distinguished father, Jacob, who wrestled with the angel till the breaking of the day, and, because he prevailed, was given the name Israel. Whatever may be said concerning the bigotry and boastfulness and backwardness of the dwellers in Judea, it was on those high, isolated, protected hills that the chosen people were prepared to accomplish their divine mission among men, and in Judea chiefly transpired the events most intimate and vitallyconnected with the history of revelation and redemption. It may be added that the very defects in the virtues of the dwellers on those isolated Judean hills—their exclusiveness, narrowness, selfishness—were due to those geographical features which made their home supremely the providential land. I may be permitted here to quote a few lines from Palestine's most sympathetic and most inspiring geographer, George Adam Smith: "Judea was the seat of one enduring dynasty of Israel, the site of their temple, the platform of their chief prophets. After their great exile they rallied round her capital, and cen-

The New President of Butler College

Thomas Carr Howe was born near Charlestown, Indiana, in 1867. His father, Robert L. Howe, and his uncle, W. D. Howe, were for many years faithful preachers in the Christian church. His mother was Elizabeth Carr and belonged to one of the pioneer families of that section of Indiana, as well as in the principles of the great reformation.

He went through the public schools of Charlestown, Indiana, during the pastorate of his father for that congregation. In the fall of 1884, his father moved to Irvington, to give his sons, T. C. and W. D. Howe, the advantages of Butler College. President Howe distinguished himself as a college boy in essay and oratorical contests, winning the sophomore prizes in each of the above. He was editor-in-chief of the Butler Collegian during his senior year. He was graduated in 1889, and in the fall of the same year became instructor of Latin and German. In the summer of 1890 he was married to Miss Jennie Armstrong, daughter of Addison F. and Mary S. Armstrong of Kokomo, Indiana, both stalwart members of the Christian church. During the same summer he went to Europe and spent the summer in travel, and in the fall entered the University of Berlin, where he remained for two years. In the fall of 1892 he returned and took up the work of Armstrong Professor of Germanic Languages. Four years afterwards he was granted a leave of absence, and attended Harvard University Graduate School, where he remained for three years, receiving his Master's Degree in 1897 and his Ph. D. in 1899. He also served as instructor in German at Harvard University for two years. In 1899 he returned to Butler College, where he has been a member of the faculty ever since. He was a member of the Legislature for the session of 1905, representing Marion county. In the spring of 1906 he was appointed by the college to complete the raising of $250,000, new endowment for the college, which had been inaugurated by a gift of $100,000 from Hon. Joseph I. Irwin, Columbus, Indiana, an enterprise which he conducted most skilfully and successfully.

After the retirement of President Butler on a Carnegie pension, he was appointed dean of the college and served in that capacity until his election as president.

President Howe has not limited his activity to mere college work; he is a member of the Indianapolis Commercial Club, the Indianapolis Literary Club and the Irvington Athenaeum, having served the latter institution as president. He has also served as a member of the Bethany Assembly Board for a number of years, and is at present president of the American Christian Education Society, and a member of the Board of Ministerial Relief.

In private affairs he has been for years vice president of the Armstrong-Landon Hardware Company, a large business corporation, and has taken an active part in the affairs of that company. He has been a loyal member of the Christian church for a quarter of a century and a member of the Official Board of the Downey Avenue Christian Church for about fifteen years. He is by conviction and inheritance a most loyal and devoted member of the Church of Christ. As indicative of his attitude towards the church, we make a quotation from his speech on the occasion of his election as president: "I sincerely believe that it is a part of the service of the church to take part in furnishing the means of higher education, and because of this fact, and my interests in college work, I have a deep concern for Butler College. I desire to see maintained at Butler, an educational institution of the highest grade, consistent with our financial resources, and in closest possible sympathy with the Disciples of Christ. My thought is that it ought to be an institution, in which the public can take the greatest pride as a factor in its educational affairs, and which our people can also look upon as their contribution to the general educational effort of the state of Indiana. And so far as lies within our power, we desire to make this, in every way, a worthy contribution. Located as it is, very near the center of population of the United States, and in the center of the Disciples of Christ, it holds a strategic position, and it is our intention to do our utmost to take advantage of this superb location. We wish to have the support and hearty co-operation of our people everywhere, but especially of those in the state of Indiana, to whom it ought most directly appeal, in furthering this enterprise, and feel that the effort made ought to bring rich results both for the cause of sound scholarship and good education, and our church at large."

Butler College seems to be taking on new life, and it is especially emphasizing the great work for which it was created. It has more than thirty young men studying for the ministry and reports from last year's work show that more than seven hundred additions were made to the church under the ministry of seventeen of these young men. We doubt if a better showing can be made by any of our colleges, and we heartily congratulate the board of directors of Butler College in the selection of Brother Howe as president.

PERFECTION.

Michael Angelo, the famous sculptor, was showing a visitor over his studio, and pointed out how, on the great work in which he was engaged, he had polished this part, softened that, retouched this since his last visit. "Yes, I see," answered the visitor; "but these things are such trifles." "So they may be," replied the great master; "but remember that trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifle."

turies later they expended upon her fortresses the last efforts of their freedom. From the day when the land was taken in pledge by the dust of the patriarchs, till the remnant of the garrison slaughtered themselves out at Mesada, rather than fall into Roman hands, or till at Bether the very last revolt was crushed by Hadrian, Judea was the birthplace, the stronghold, the sepulchre of God's people. "For us Christians it is enough to remember, besides, that Judea contains the places of our Lord's birth and death, with the scenes of his temptation, his more painful ministry, and his agony."

"US ROYALTIES."

One day, while on a hunt with a number of royal guests, the old kaiser grew tired, and decided to go home quietly. Two of his guests, noticing this, accompanied him. They had walked along the road some distance when a farmer with his wagon overtook them. One of the gentlemen asked him to take them along. The farmer consented, and the three climbed into the wagon.

Curiosity soon got the better of the countryman, and turning to one of the gentlemen, he asked:

"And who might you be?"

"I am the Grand Duke of Mecklenberg."

"Good!" cried the farmer, laughing. And turning to the second gentlemen he asked, "And who are you?"

"I am the King of Saxony."

"Why, this is getting better," said the farmer. Finally he turned to the third.

"Well, and who are you?"

"I am William, Emperor of Germany."

"Well, this beats all!" said the countryman. "And now let me introduce myself. I am Frederick the Great! And now get along," he said, hitting his horse. "You must prance a little in honor of us royalties!"

Lesson III. The Gospels

H. L. Willett

There were no writing produced by the followers of Jesus until at least a score of years after the close of his ministry. The Lord himself did not write, and his disciples felt no impulse to prepare books. They were preachers rather than writers.

The earliest writings of the New Testament were epistles, such as those of Paul, sent to the different churches which needed instruction in matters pertaining to the Christian life. The testimony which the earlier epistles bear to the life of Christ is therefore older and closer to his ministry than that recorded in the Gospels.

The Gospels were based on earlier sources, both written and oral. This is pointed out by Luke, who speaks of the fact that "many have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning those matters which have been fulfilled among us," and adds that a second source from which knowledge has come is found in the utterances of those "who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of tne Word."

These memories of Christ's life and work were finally gathered into four brief tracts or pamphlets called, from the nature of the "good news" which they contain, "Gospels." Three of them have very much the same structure and material, and are therefore called the "Synoptic Gospels." These, Matthew, Mark and Luke differ in many ways from the Gospel of John.

The earliest of the gospels was Mark. It receives its name from John Mark, the son of Mary of Jerusalem. He was a helper of Peter and later of Paul. Early tradition asserts that it was the substance of Peter's teachings regarding the life of Christ, written down by Mark. It was probably written in Italy about 65 A. D.

The second in order of time is Matthew. Its name is derived from the man whom Jesus called from the business of customs-collector at Capernaum to be a disciple. It contains much more of the teachings of Jesus than does Mark. It also quotes from the Old Testament frequently, and was probably intended especially for Jewish people who were acquainted with the Hebrew Scriptures. It was perhaps based on an earlier work written in Hebrew or Aramaic. Its date was about 70 A. D.

The Gospel of Luke is named from the "the good physician" the companion of the Apostle Paul. Luke was the only non-Jew among the writers of the New Testament. This Gospel presents the picture of Christ as the universal man and Savior. It adds to the material of Mark and Matthew the wonderful "Perean section" of the ministry of Jesus, words and deeds recorded in connection with his activity in Perea, on the east side of the Jordan. It was probably written somewhere in Asia Minor about 80 A. D.

The Gospel of John was the latest of all the memoirs of Jesus to take form. It is connected with the testimony of the "beloved disciple," and presents a more reflective and argumentative statement than the others. It is concerned with the task of explaining and vindicating the ministry of Jesus more than the "Synoptic" Gospels, which attempt only to relate the story of the life of the Lord. Tradition asserts that the Fourth Gospel was written at Ephesus about the year 95 A. D.

The four Gospels do not contain all the facts of the life of Christ. They are merely selections made from the great treasure of early Christian remembrance concerning him. In their brevity and directness lies their chief value. They are not written with the purpose of preserving the record for future ages, but rather to reach the generation then living. They were written by plain men, without attempt at literary art. Yet they are the most attractive and convincing documents in our possession.

Other attempts were made to write gospels in the early ages. Some of these books have been preserved, such as "The Gospel of Nicodemus," "The Gospel of the Infancy," "The Gospel of Peter," etc. Such books are found among the apocrypha of the New Testament. But in comparison with the four books we have been considering they are as chaff to wheat. There is in the writings of the New Testament a simplicity, directness, urgency, convincing power and inspiration which the others do not possess. For this reason the church throughout its history has decided that these four Gospels and no others should be in the Bible.

"Vat's use to todge dem pullets?" sang out the little Jew. "Dey'll hit you shust as vell vere you are as vere you ain't!"

A street car "masher" tried in every way to attract the attention of the pretty young girl opposite him. Just as he had about given up, the girl, entirely unconscious of what had been going on, happened to glance in his direction. The "masher" immediately took fresh courage.

"It's cold out today, isn't it?" he ventured.

The girl smiled and nodded assent, but had nothing to say.

"My name is Specknoodle," he volunteered.

"Oh, I am so sorry," she said sympathetically, as she left the car.

"D-d-d'ye wanter see me g-g-get me fa-fa-face punched?" stammered the boy. "D-d-dat big g-g-guy'd tink I was mo-mocking him."

The Sunday School Lesson--Cross and Tomb*

H. L. Willett

The cross of Christ is the central milestone of history. Before it was reached, men had traveled in darkness or twilight. While they were passing it the sun rose. The world has been a different place since that day. It is strange that an instrument of torture should become the sign of hope and the proud badge of service. Yet the cross has been the symbol under which the armies of the dawn have marched, and today the greatest victories are won in its power.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE CROSS.

The mediæval church made much of the sufferings of Christ upon the cross. With elaborate detail it described his agonies. Its art was full of the fearful torture of the crucifixion. The mind of that age loved to dwell in morbid contemplation on the ghastly scene. The same thing is reflected in the hymns of those years. And in the ritual of some of the holy orders in the church, the horror of the tragedy of Gethsemane and Calvary has been carried to its uttermost limit.

THE HORROR OF THE CROSS.

It is not by such reproduction of the sufferings of our Lord that we gain the real value of his death. To be sure, this terrible side is not forgotten. There are moments when the whole cruel truth sweeps over us in a wave of horror and dismay. How can we endure the memory of that agony through which the blessed Master went! It is enough that the saints and martyrs should have gone the way of the faggot and the wrack. Surely Jesus has no place there. A convert in the South Sea Islands heard the missionary tell the story of the crucifixion, and in uncontrollable agitation he cried out: Jesus away from there; that is my place."

THE HIGHER MEANING.

But the story of the Master's sufferings is but the smallest part of the sublime significance of the cross. It is indeed that part which first attracts attention, and longest holds the regard of the less thoughtful. But the deeper study of the scene carries one into regions of wonder and love in which the terror of the tragedy are transfigured in the light of the divine mystery of atoning grace.

THE NECESSITY OF THE CROSS.

Why was it necessary that Jesus should die? Could not his life of beneficient helpfulness have gone on to a serene and happy conclusion, amid the loving reverence of the men he had helped, and the praises of an honoring world? It is a fascinating dream to imagine the lengthening years of such a life as he might have given to the world. But that would have been a life of success. The only gospel it could have given forth would have been a story of courage. honor and widening devotion. It would have been the gospel for men who succeed.

THE GOSPEL FOR THE DESPAIRING.

But where would have been the gospel for the men who fail, for the sore wounded and distressed, the weary and heavy laden, who have been beaten and buffeted by failure and by sin? There would be no help in such a story for these. They want no mocking spectacle of achievement through human strength, but the revelation of a power which can triumph over human weakness and despair. That all-conquering life, which went down in seeming defeat only that it might gain its final victory, is the secret of the cross of Christ.

COMPLETION OF LIFE.

The death of Christ was the fitting completion of his life. Without it the life he lived would have had no appropriate and revealing ending. It was Christ's death which showed the character of the daily ministry he had set himself from the first to perform. Neither the life nor the death of Christ was complete alone. Each needed the other to make it fully understood.

THE FATHER'S LOVE.

The death of Christ was the final disclosure of the Father's love. It was not the manifestation of a monarch's anger, but the showing forth of paternal affection. Men would never have believed that "God so loved the world" had they not seen the fact made plain past all misreading in the cross of Christ.

THE SINS THAT KILLED JESUS.

The death of Christ was the divine way of making forever odious the sins that brought it to pass. The envy of the priests, the avarice of Judas, the servility of Pilate and the shallowness of the populace brought him to his death. But those are our own sins, and never could we have seen them in their true light except at the cross of Christ. We may well look with concern upon any action of our own which repeats those crimes which brought Jesus to the cross.

The deeper meanings of that divine transaction we cannot know now, but we shall know hereafter. It is enough for us to see the human side of the atonement, and to understand that in the cross lies the comfort of the saints, the hope of the world.

CALVARY

By GEORGE A. WILLIAMS.

The Pain.

Torture of body, loneliness of soul;
Hated, despised, the Father's face enveiled,
Fighting the bitter fight alon,e alone,
While priest and people at his sufferings railed;
Dire was the pain of Calvary that day,
When Jesus breathed his anguished life away.

The Joy.

"O Lord, remember me!" a soul in need,
A gleam of faith, though groping, faint and dim.
Forth leaps the love, forgiving, full and sweet;
The Master's heart receives and cleanses him.
At morn a robber, meeting his just meed,
But now a saint from sin's foul fetters freed.

The Fellowship.

A man redeemed with his Redeemer stood
In Paradise; full was the heart of both.
"O brother of my pain," the Master said,
"Now brother of my joy, by my love-troth,
Thy cry of faith brought sweetest joy to me;
First fruits of my shed blood thou e're shalt be."

ADVANTAGES OF UNFORGIVENESS

Satan rejoices every time any one feels unforgiving toward any one else. For unforgivingness means unlove, and that means hatefulness, which always plays into the hands of the Devil. No Christian can serve Christ, or loyally represent Christ, while withholding free, full forgiveness from a single fellowman—no matter how unworthy of forgiveness that fellowman is. The Christian who says of any human being that, because of this or that terrible injury or injustice he can never forgive him, has abandoned Christ and is serving the Devil in that act. The Devil knows this and seeks persistently to persuade us that there are some things, or some persons, that we ought never to forgive. He succeeds in persuading more of us than he ought to. Paul gave as a reason for free, unconditional forgiveness: "that no advantage maye be gained over us by Satan; for we are not ignorant of his devices." We are fond of claiming that it is our own high sense of righteousness and fairness that makes it "impossible" for us to forgive certain offenders; but the real reason is our likeness to that very offender, in our confessed allegiance to the same Satan that he serves.—Sunday School Times.

"The mark you made by making a mark of others is not worth while."

The Prayer Meeting--The Peacemaker

Topic for May 27. Matt 5:9

Silas Jones

There is one kind of strife Jesus encouraged—the strife of truth with falsehood, of right with wrong. The peace of God rests not upon him who calls good evil and evil good, who puts light for darkness and darkness for light; who puts bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter. The blessing of God in Christ Jesus descends upon him who allays fratricidal strife. We are members of the body of Christ. We live not unto ourselves, but for the edification of the others. The disciple of the Lord seeks the companionship and sympathetic co-operation of his brethren rather than their exclusion from the opportunities he prizes for himself.

THE COST OF WAR.

The direct annual expenditure of the nations of the world for armies and navies is $1,781,663,179 in this time of peace." "To this must be added a very large proportion of the national debts of the world, which to a large extent, particularly with the larger debts, and not seldom absolutely wholly, may be considered war debts. To this must be still added the enormous sums spent, e. g., in the United States for pensions to officers and soldiers. And these are only the public costs. Besides this are the private losses, of life and health and property, incurred by war, besides the incalculable economic loss involved in the diversion of millions of people, in times of peace as well as of war, to the service of the army and navy, a burden which robs many a country of its best young manhood, and to escape which much of the best young blood of Europe migrates to the New World." To this quotation from "The Encyclopedia of Reform" may be added the following statistics from the same source: Cost of the English-French war, 1793-1815, $6,250,000,000, loss of life, 1,900,000; Crimean War, $1,525,000,000, loss of life, 485,000; United States Civil War, $3,700,000,000, loss of life, 656,000; Franco-German War, 1870-71, $1,580,000,000, loss of life, 290,000; Russo-Japanese War, $2,250,000,000, loss of life, 555,900.

The peacemaker will further increase the world's hatred of war by showing how it brutalizes men. He will pay a tribute of respect to the brave and patriotic soldiers who have found it necessary to oppose tyranny on the field of battle. We should be unworthy of the civilization we enjoy if we should forget their sacrifices. But we must remember that they were no lovers of war. They loved peace. No truly great man has ever delighted in the destruction of human life. But the sense of justice and gratitude that prompts us to honor the noble dead and their surviving comrades also prompts to the denunciation of the brutality and conscienceless ambition that have recklessly and ruthlessly poured out the blood of millions upon millions of human beings, and have destroyed the priceless products of ages of toil and sacrifice. They who follow brutish leaders become like them.

SONS OF GOD.

Truly, they are sons of God whose trust in God is such that they can live in fraternal relations with men. How can they be sons of God who are enemies of men? The peacemaker begins at the beginning. Before he asks the nation to make treaties of arbitration, he is busy with the work of making men with sense enough to live at peace one with another. International agreements are useful when they are supported by nations of intelligence and character. Barbarism and ignrance promote war. By coming into right relations with God, men are taught to cultivate the virtues of peace and good will.

Christian Endeavor--Christian Voters

Topic for May 24. Ps. 28:1-9

THE BALLOT-BOX SOLDIER.

By Rev. Zed Hetzel Copp, in "C. E. World."

The Christian at the ballot-box is a soldier of the Cross, on the firing-line in the army of the Common Good. The issue is seemingly simple and partisan; the conflict titanic is heaven-high and hell-deep; the result generally is Sedan, Sebastopol, Waterloo and Yorktown all thrown together.

The Christian's ballot should be a concrete prayer for righteousness—the evidence and essence of all his praying. If to pray aright requires "spirit and understanding," so to vote aright requires keen interest and searching investigation, for back of the ballot-box is the primary, and back of that is the patriot. The Christian's ballot has increased potential power by participating in primaries. To neglect these duties is doubly to arm the adversary; is high treason against God, and traitorous to the country.

Scan the issue, know the candidate, and then in the hour of voting heed not the voice of partisan prejudice,—the old tempter in modern form,—but listen to the "still, small voice" that speaks from the Shekinah of reason and judgment, and vote for God and Home and Country.

We need the education of the public conscience concerning the sacredness of the ballot and the duty of keeping it out of the power of unscrupulous politicians.—O. W. Stewart.

A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God;
And from it force, nor doors nor locks
Can shield you,—'tis the ballot-box.

A hostess of Mr. Jacob Riis once asked him how, when he was only a reporter, he so reported the crimes of lower New York as to rouse the city to reform the shocking conditions there. The philanthropic reporter hesitated, gave one or two possible reasons, then added, "And then, you know, I am a Christian, and when a Christian sees a wrong, he must do his utmost to right that wrong."

Calvin P. Titus, the young American soldier who planted the Stars and Stripes on the walls of Peking, and received for his bravery a West Point scholarship and a medal by Congress, deserves to be honored as a hero. He also deserves honor for this saying: "My greatest aim is to be a good American."

One of the pipers in Wellington's army at the beginning of an important engagement received a severe wound in his thigh. Disregarding the pain, however, he refused to be removed from the scene of conflict, but sat on a bank, playing patriotic airs during the remainder of the battle. Most Endeavorers are not voters, but they can at least cheer those who are in the thick of the fight.

Let us remember that the next Annual Offering is for Church Extension.

The brotherhood will be glad to hear that the will of Mr. Bondurant of De Land, Ill., which was recently contested, was sustained in a recent trial. It is not likely that the case will be appealed because the evidence was so overwhelmingly in favor of the will. When the estate is settled it will net the Board of Church Extension about $75,000.

W. H. Hanna, Laoag, P. I., reports twenty-three baptisms at different points. He states also that a Bible Institute has just been held at Laoag, with an attendance of fourteen native preachers. It lasted a week and was very profitable. He is just now preparing to leave the Philippine Islands for his regular furlough and will reach America some time in the near future.

The Congo authorities have granted the Foreign Society a new site for a mission station at Longa on the Bosira River. It is more than 100 miles from Bolenge. The missionaries in Africa and all the friends of that work are jubilant. The land is leased for thirty years. The Commissaire says the land can be renewed at the expiration of that time. The rental is nominal. It amounts to $7.50 a year. The Lord be praised for this new token of His loving favor. More missionaries will be sent to Africa at once.

Coffee Topers as Bad as Others.

"A friend of our family who lived with us a short time was a great coffee drinker and a continual sufferer with dyspepsia. He admitted that coffee disagreed with him but you know how the coffee drinker will hold on to his coffee even if he knows it causes dyspepsia.

"One day he said to me that Postum Food Coffee had been recommended and suggested that he would like very much to try it. I secured a package and made it strictly according to directions. He was delighted with the new beverage, as was every one of our family. He became very fond of it and in a short time his dyspepsia disappeared. He continued using the Postum and in about three months gained twelve pounds.

"My husband is a practising physician and regards Postum as the healthiest of all beverages. He never drinks coffee, but is very fond of Postum. In fact, all of our family are, and we never think of drinking coffee any more." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

for missions as follows: Foreign Christian Missionary Society, $5,883; American Christian Missionary Society, $3,585; Church Extension Fund, $5 765; Christian Woman's Board of Missions, $25,888, or a total of $41,126. This is a great record, one for which the minister and church have a right to be proud. These amounts include living-link funds and special individual offerings.

W. T. Hilton, pastor in Greenville, Tex., is leading his loyal people in a good meeting which began last Sunday. Prof. Leonard Dougherty is leading the music.

Last week the Foreign Society received $500 from a friend in California, on the Annuity Plan. Also $100 from a friend in Chicago. These Annuity gifts aid the Society in solving its building problems. It is hoped the number will be increased.

The present distressing famine in India embraces a territory of 15,000 square miles, more than Great Britain, Ireland, Hungary, and Belgium combined, with a population of about fifty millions. About 1,500,000 people are now receiving relief. The missionaries of the Foreign Society are in the famine district. Any friends wishing to make a contribution for famine relief, can send money to F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The returns for the first seven months of the year for Foreign Missions, reveal the following facts: There has been a gain of fourteen contributing churches. The churches as churches have given $70,134, or $1,538 less than for the corresponding seven months last year. It is to be hoped that only hard times is reflected in this loss and that there is no less vital interest. There has been a loss also of $14,390 in Annuities, and $12,587 in personal gifts, a total loss for seven months of $24,546. The gain in bequests is $4,098. The total receipts for seven months is $93,716. It is hoped that the scare of hard times is now passed and that there will be a steady gain in the receipts until the close of the year.

L. C. Crandall, pastor in Rushville, Ill., recently received into the fellowship of the Disciples, Rev. John K. Ford, formerly of Nashville, Tenn. Mr. Ford had been for twenty years an evangelist and pastor of the Methodist church. He is spoken of by Brother Crandall in high terms of praise and commended to our churches seeking an able pastor.

A note received from an excellent place in Michigan says: "The people of this city wish to unite in securing a minister, a man that is not denominational, a strong preacher and teacher. There is an open church and parsonage. The salary named is generous, "for the right man.'" If any of our readers are interested in this opportunity we shall be glad to forward the names to our inquirer.

The installation of Miner Lee Bates as president of Hiram College will take place Wednesdayfi May 20, at 1 p. m. Charles S. Medbury of University Place Church, Des Moies, Iowa, will speak on behalf of the churches and educational institutions of the brotherhood. On behalf of Ohio colleges it is expected that President L. E. Holden of Wooster University will speak. Judge Frederick A. Henry of Cleveland, president of the Board of Trustees, will preside. Following the afternoon program, a luncheon will be served at four o'clock to invited guests, alumni and members of the Faculty and Board of Trustees. In the evening at 7:30 the Hiram Vocal Society, conducted by Francis J. Sadlier, director of the Department of Music, will give a concert. All friends of Hiram are invited and a large attendance is anticipated.

For the first six months of this missionary year, the Board of Church Extension has made exactly fifty loans, aggregating $104,000. It will be noted that the average size of our loans is larger than formerly, which means that we are occupying the larger towns and the cities more than we used to. This does not mean that we are neglecting the smaller towns. Church Extension is an organized movement of our brotherhood into the growing towns and cities, and we must make larger loans to do this, which was provided by a resolution in the Convention at Nashville, Tenn., in 1892. When this Fund was organized the brotherhood recommended that the largest loan made should be $500. The Des Moines Convention in 1890 recommended that the largest loan made be increased to $1,000. Then our growing work in the cities demanded that the limit be taken off, and that the Board be permitted to use its judgment in making larger loans to enter our growing towns and cities. The wisdom of this resolution has been demonstrated in hundreds of cases where we are now well established in the larger towns and cities because of timely and adequate loans by the Board of Church Extension.

CHARLES E. VARNEY TO LECTURE.

A treat awaits those who can arrange to hear Bro. Varney in his popular lecture, "Apples of Gold," to be given in the Englewood Christian church, Stewart avenue and Sixty-sixth place, on the evening of Friday, May 22. C. E. Varney is taking rank as one of the foremost platform orators. This lecture, which is semi-humorous, semi-serious, will be given a musical setting. Admission will be free, with a silver collection.

DEATH OF MRS. HELEN E. MOSES

Indianapolis, Ind., May 11—Mrs. Moses passed beyond this morning. Funeral at one o'clock Tuesday at Indianapolis. Burial at Marion, Ohio. The influence of her life is eternal.

Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

The sad word which the above telegram brings to us as the paper goes to press will come as a shock to many Disciples, and will touch the heart strings of the thousands who knew Mrs. Moses but to revere her as a noble Christian woman. The whole Christian brotherhood will mourn with the C. W. B. M. the loss of that earnest soul by whose untold sacrifices and unceasing labors, as well as brilliant leadership, the successes of that organization have largely been made possible.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY extends sincerest sympathy to the grieving family and friends.

FOR A KANSAS COLLEGE OF THE BIBLE.

At the close of the Kansas Ministerial Institute at Emporia, Kan., April 27-29, the Kansas Christian Educational Association was formed. It is the purpose to take steps to establish a College of the Bible in connection with the State University at Lawrence, Kan. Chancellor Strong of the University was present, and urged this step upon us, and many of us have been

CHANGE IN FOOD

Works Wonders in Health.

It is worth knowing that a change in food can cure dyspepsia. "I deem it my duty to let you know how Grape-Nuts food has cured me of indigestion.

"I had been troubled with it for years, until last year my doctor recommended Grape-Nuts food to be used every morning. I followed instructions and now I am entirely well.

"The whole family like Grape-Nuts, we use four packages a week. You are welcome to use this testimonial as you see fit."

The reason this lady was helped by the use of Grape-Nuts food, is that it is predigested by natural processes and therefore does not tax the stomach as the food she had been using; it also contains the elements required for building up the nervous system. If that part of the human body is in perfect working order there can be no dyspepsia, for nervous energy represents the steam that drives the engine.

When the nervous system is run down, the machinery of the body works badly. Grape-Nuts food can be used by small children as well as adults. It is perfectly cooked and ready for instant use.

convinced for some time that this furnishes the best solution of our educational problem. The State University plant, costing a million and six hundred thousand dollars and requiring a current expense account equivalent to the returns on an endowment of six millions, is at our service. We have no college in Kansas, and cannot establish such a plant. This seems to me to be one of the greatest opportunities ever placed before us. At a minimum expense we can give the most efficient training to our young men for the ministry. Over two thousand are in attendance this year at the University, of whom over two hundred belong to the Christian church. It is a place of power. A committee of five was appointed to be associated with the President, W. A. Parker, of Emporia, and myself as Secretary. This committee will report on ways and means at the next State convention. INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION

The Tentative Program for the Twelfth International Sunday School Convention, which meets at Louisville, Ky., June 18-23, has just been issued. It proves to be an earnest of the greatest Sunday school gathering the world has ever seen; unquestionably the twelfth international convention will be the most epoch making gathering in Sunday school history. The foremost speakers of the Sunday school world are announced to speak, and the living questions of religious education are to be discussed. Not the least important topic is the International Lesson System, which is alotted liberal time on Saturday morning the 20th. The Teacher Training Department, the Adult Bible Class, the Home Department, House to House Visitation, Temperance, Missions, and a host of other vital themes have hours and sessions devoted to them at the hands of specialists.

Coming as it does in the very heart of our brotherhood, our people should and undoubtedly will attend this great convento in large numbers. There never was a time in our own history when Sunday school enthusiasm was at so great a heighth. Perhaps we have grown over-enthusiastic in some direction, but at any rate we are all alert and ready for anything that tends to place the open Bible in the hands of all men everywhere. Let us come to this convention, the recognized head of all Sunday school activity, and receive its guidance and knowledge and inspiration for a larger and more effective service in the days to come.

Kentucy is synonomous with hospitality, and our metropolis has long since been preparing to open wide the gates on this occasion. Our own churches in the city are in the front rank in this welcoming throng. As the convention is held over a Sunday, opportunity will be afforded all to attend Sunday school and church at one of our eight congregations in the city, and it is needless to say that special rallies and great sermons will constitute the order for the day. Moreover, Louisville is the home of our Kentucky Christian Bible School Association, and our office at 218 Kellar Bldg., corner Fifth and Main streets, is to be headquarters for our people, where you may have your mail directed, or drop in and meet your friends and write letters, or come in touch with our State Bible School Association in all its phases of services. Come to see us while attending the convention.

Keep the Wheels Turning

One of the little economies that help toward a substantial saving is the use of a good axle grease. A grease without proper "body" runs off. One too heavy stiffens on the axle and adds to the pull.

MICA AXLE GREASE

is right—won't run, won't stiffen, won't wear out as soon as other grease will. Covers the axle with an almost frictionless coating of powdered mica and keeps your wheels turning when the other fellow, who uses poor grease, is stuck. Nothing like Mica Axle Grease for a tired wagon. Ask the dealer for it.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Virgil—The meeting has been one of more than ordinary success. Virgil is a small town, having a population of about one hundred, and the country around is thinly settled. The religious tide of the town was quite low.

The meeting began in a quiet way without very much advertising, but the careful methods of the evangelists soon began to tell. People soon began to step out for Christ, some almost every night and several times as many as five and six and even more than that at once.

The second Sunday sixteen took the stand. Those reached were the very best people in the community, including nearly all the business men of Virgil.

The total results of the meeting have been seventy-three confessions and a good church of more than fifty members is being organized, with money raised for the support of a minister.

We are expecting good work, as Brother Woodman is to stay as our preacher.

Brother Zerby is surely a faithful, capable worker and together with Brother Woodman, make a splendid team.

Additions reported at Ministers' Meeting—Vermont Avenue (F. D. Power) 5 confessions. Fifteenth Street (J. E. Stuart), 16 additions. H Street (W. G. Oram), 2 by confession and baptism and 4 by letter. Ninth Street (Geo. A. Miller), 10 confessions and 2 by letter. Total additions, 39. Vermont Avenue had 408 in Sunday School on Easter; Ninth Street had 591, of these 130 men were in two classes. The other Sunday schools were well attended. H. Street raised $1,506 on debt fund. This covers the entire debt. W. G. Oram and his faithful people deserve much praise. J. E. Stuart held a great meeting at Fifteenth Street. He is an eloquent preacher and a hustler. Fifteenth Street Sunday School raised $44.45 on Easter. W. F. Smith is doing a substantial work at Whitney Avenue. He is doing well among men both in and out of the church. W. T. Laprade, who for a long time has faithfully served the Vienna Church, leaves that work in May.

IN MEMORIAM

MISSELBROOK.

Many American preachers and others who have enjoyed the hospitality of the beautiful home of Brother F. Misselbrook, of Southhampton, England, will learn of his decease on April 10, 1908, with deep regret. He was only fifty-nine years of age but had been in failing health for some years, having broken down at the age of fifty from overwork. He was a man of tremendous energy and of great business ability, although a self-made man. His mind worked like a flash and he came to conclusions in an instant, seldom, however, finding it necessary to revise them. Although a man of positive convictions and a keen competitor in business, he never made an enemy, and the general esteem in which he was held among his business associates was evidenced by the presence at the graveside of every prominent tradesman in his line of business, in the town of 110,000 population. His life was governed by principles from which he never swerved. He was keenly intellectual and original in expression, but unpretentious in the extreme, even preferring to assume ignorance. He was kindness itself to anyone in need, but never effusive; although a man of firm convictions, he always read more of the other side than that of his own—a Liberal in politics, he was a constant reader of the Daily Telegraph, a Tory paper. He bought the latest books on many subjects and read them with painstaking care. He became a member of the Church of Christ in 1880, under the ministry of Brother H. S. Earl, and occupied all offices of importance in the gift of the church and Sunday school until failing health compelled his retirement. For years he had been the church's largest financial supporter, making it a standing offer to double almost any fund that was raised. If he made a mistake it was in not distributing his gifts more widely. The will provides $2,000 for the church debt, which nearly clears the $40,000 property. He approached the end with great confidence. A few days before he died he said: "My theology is the doxology," and again, "You may discuss theology if you like; I care nothing for it now; give me Jesus; He is all I want." His life had been like the rapids of Niagara, and the Falls, and the whirlpool beyond, but the end was like the smooth-flowing river between verdant banks. "Everything is ready; I have finished my course; I want no priest; I want no lawyer; I am ready." And he kissed his hand to his life's companion and fell asleep saying, "Good-night, good-night."

A widow, four children, and two grandchildren remain to mourn his loss. The writer, son-in-law of the deceased, conducted the funeral by special request, which was a private one at the house, with a brief service at the graveside. A memorial service was held at the Church of Christ on Sunday evening following the funeral and was conducted by the highly respected and honored friend of the family, Brother W. Durban.

Reds and Blues Contest Buttons

REDS AND BLUES Contest plans have proved wonderfully successful in Y. M. C. A. work and are proving more so in Sunday school work. By making use of our Reds and Blues plans you can easily double your school membership in a month or six weeks. You can break up irregular attendance in a very short time. You can raise large sums of money for your needs. You can secure church attendance, bringing of lesson helps, bringing of collection, coming on time.

The Reds and Blues plans please because they set everybody at work heartily and enthusiastically and because each leaves the school in a healthy condition when the contest is ended.

Each Reds and Blues plan requires dividing the school into two sections—Reds and Blues and appointing captains, one or more, for each side, a social or other treat to be given at the close of the contest, when those on the winning side receive ice-cream and cake, and the losers crackers and cheese, or some other attraction to celebrate the close of the contest and the victory. Treat is to be paid for by the school. Complete instructions sent with each order.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net. postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo.. one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

KEEPING A BRAVE HEART.

Beware of letting your care degenerate into anxiety and unrest; tossed as you are amid the winds and waves of sundry troubles, keep your eyes fixed on the Lord, and say, "Oh, my God, I look to thee alone; be thou my guide, my pilot"; and then be comforted. When the shore is gained, who will heed the toil and the storm? And we shall steer safely through every storm, so long as our heart is right, our intention fervent, our courage steadfast, and our trust fixed on God. If at times we are somewhat stunned by the tempest, never fear; let us take breath and go on afresh.

How to Conduct a Sunday School

MARION LAWRENCE

Suggestions and Plans for the Conduct of Sunday Schools in all Departments—Filled with Details, Specific and Practical — Valuable Information.

Dr. Jesse L. Hurlbut says: "The actual experiences and plans of a working superintendent who has given his whole heart and mind to his work. There is very little of theory and much of practice."

This book might be termed an encyclopedia of Sunday School wisdom, written by the most experienced writer in the field. The author is secretary of the International Sunday School Committee, has visited schools in every part of the world and compared ideas with more workers than any other person in the land. ROMAN OR PROTESTANT?

It is apparent that the Episcopal Church is facing something of a crisis. For many years two divergent tendencies have been working toward opposite ends. The great majority of Episcopalians are earnest protestants. They accept all the meaning of their church history which derives from the separation from Rome during the reign of Henry VIII. To them the claim of the Roman Catholic Church that the orders of Episcopalianism are spurious is of little significance. They at least abide in the conviction that the succession in which their ministers stand is truly apostolic whether derived from Rome or Canterbury.

But another sentiment has grown into strength in a wing of the English Church and is finding expression also among the High Church party in America. This is the effort to Romanize the Anglican and Episcopalian ministry and to lead back to papal supervision the entire Church which is thought of by this party as having unfortunately left the mother organization. The High Church in England has caused great anxiety among Anglicans of the broader and more protestant spirit by its constant approaches to Rome in the forms of its worship and in its pronouncements of Catholic authority.

This matter has come to something of an issue in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. It has always been the theory of that Church that only its own ministers were rightfully ordained, or in the "succession," as it is termed. It insists that no preacher has the right of public instruction on religion or the celebration of the ordinances who is not of their company. Naturally, of course, they have declined to admit into their pulpits ministers of other bodies. With rare exceptions this rule has obtained in Episcopal churches, but without any definite action on the part of the Church as a whole.

At a recent meeting of the house of Bishops the question came up for action, and the more liberal views prevailed to the extent that a canon was adopted providing for the admission of non-Episcopalian ministers to the pulpits of their churches upon the consent of the presiding bishop of the diocese. This rule is of course interpreted according to the leanings of those who discuss it. The High Church party insists that it is a limitation of the privilege which the too liberal rectors have assumed of inviting other protestant ministers to preach in their pulpits. The Broad Church party on the other hand claim that it is a recognition of the "open pulpit" on the part of the Episcopal Church, and that the old days of exclusiveness and arrogance are passing away.

Meantime some of the more aggressive members of the High Church, or Romanizing party have emphasized their disapproval of the action of the bishops by resigning their parishes and announcing openly that they were going into the Roman Church. The most prominent example of this kind is that of the Rev. William McGarvey of Philadelphia, who with his three assistants, have resigned from the rectorship of St. Elizabeth's Episcopal Church in that city. In a published statement reciting their reasons for taking this action, they say, among other things:

"When were were ordained we were persuaded that the Catholic religion in its fulness was the faith of the Episcopal Church. Animated by this persuasion we gave ourselves freely to her ministry, and would gladly have laid down our lives in her service. Misgivings with regard to the legitimacy of our position were first aroused when certain of the bishops a year or two ago began to invite non-Episcopal ministers into the pulpits.

"Such action was not, of course, the actions of the Episcopal Church, although its proceeding from bishops gave it a serious import. But when the whole House of Bishops, without a dissenting vote, indorsed this practice by incorporating into the discipline of the Episcopal Church explicit provision for an open pulpit, it was manifest that either the non-Episcopal ministers had already the same ministerial status as ministers of the Word with those ordained by the bishops of the Episcopal Church, or that the Episcopal Church had by her enactment of the open-pulpit canon seriously compromised the doctrine of holy orders which we had supposed that she held in its integrity.

"Had such a canon been enacted prior to our ordination our consciences would never for a moment have allowed us to receive ordination in the Episcopal Church. * * * * She now stands forth before the world in the character which belongs to her, and by which she desires to be known. She is, as she calls herself, as in the last general convention she has demonstrated herself to be, and as most of her members regard her, a Protestant Church."

It cannot be doubted that bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church are more liberal in their views of church history and more truly protestant in their attitude than are many of the clergy who serve under them. There is a more or less constant deflection from the ranks of the Episcopal clergy to the Roman Catholic Church. Nor is it strange that this should be the case. If there is any value in the succession of ordained ministers from the early centuries, not to say from the times of the apostles themselves, the Roman Church has every advantage over the Anglican of the Episcopalian. But the spirit of the age is away from an institutionalism of this sort. There will always be those to whom an establishment is sacred, but apostolic succession tends to yield in the thought of Christendom to apostolic success, and the established churches are today fighting a battle for existence in the face of modern tendencies toward more vital things than ecclesiastical authority. There will always be those who are in danger of going the way that Newman and Manning went, but their number will decline as the actual relation of Christianity to human society is better understood.

It is a satisfaction to note the action of the House of Bishops already referred to. Many earnest Episcopalians have long felt the exclusive and uncharitable character of the attitude which their church sustains to the rest of protestanism. That they are now ready to accord even under limitations the right of religious instruction to other than their own clergy is proof that progress is being made toward that unity which is alone possible upon New Testament foundations, and away from the assumption of exclusive legitimacy which inhered in the Episcopalian demand that apostolic succession should be one of the four requisites for Christian union.

HELEN E. MOSES.

The death of Mrs. Helen E. Moses, the president of the Christian Women's Board of Missions, comes not only with the shock of surprise, but is the more pathetic because it is the culmination of the final struggle among many which this beloved woman has had with disease during the last few years. In fact, there has been hardly a time since she became prominently identified with the work of missions carried on by the women of our churches, first as secretary and then as president, that she has been free from the limitations imposed by physical suffering. At one time she hovered for days upon the very brink of death, and was only brought back by the tender ministries of loving friends and her own great courage.

Mrs. Moses was a singular and admirable combination of serenity, mildness, overcome difficulties of the most trying sort. She had borne with nobleness and patience the humblest tasks. She learned in the quietness and obscurity of her earlier years in Ohio and Kansas the qualities which made her the successful, though suffering, leader of a host of consecrated Christian women. She has stood in a noble succession. No woman was more worthy to follow Mrs. Burgess and Mrs. Atkinson than she. The work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has developed with amazing rapidity under her administration. She leaves to her successor a great and honorable task, and to the brotherhood the memory of a gracious and commanding personality.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Admirers of the Abbey series of paintings in the Boston public library illustrating the story of the Holy Grail will be interested in the news that a series of panel paintings by the same artist has just arrived from his studio in England to be placed in the state capitol building at Harrisburg, Pa. Four of the canvasses are lunettes, and four are circular in shape, and all to be placed in the dome. The lunettes represent science revealing "the treasures of the earth," the "spirit of light," "the spirit of religious liberty," and the "spirit of Vulcan, the genius of the workers in iron and steel." The circular canvasses show figures representing religion, science, law and art. The first of the lunettes shows science pointing to the depths of the earth and leading a group of men into a mine. The second gives a scene in the oil fields, with several spirit figures distributing light over the earth. The third is called "The Spirit of Religious Liberty," and the last pictures of a blast funace.

An encouraging sign of the success of the temperance cause is the activity of the liquor traffic, which amounts to desperation. The latest scheme of the trade is the organization to promote a "Model License Law," whose purpose is ostensibly to reduce the traffic to the limits of a strictly law abiding business, and to avoid the "fanaticism of prohibition," which, according to the circulars of this organization, has failed to prohibit wherever tried. It is marvelous how much opposed these men are to the work of the Anti-Saloon League and the Prohibition Party, both of whose efforts according to their insistent reports, are fruitless and ineffective. When the results are as apparent as they now appear, there is no reason for accepting for a moment any compromise offered by a traffic that is doomed to overthrow at an early day. The signs of promise are bright. The war is on to cease only with the destruction of the saloon.

The interest in the closer relations of Baptists and Disciples is rising wiith every week. The Chicago Associations, Baptists and Disciples, held a second monthly session last week. The addresses were given by Dr. McLaurin for the Baptists and Dr. Gates for the Disciples. They were of a high order, and advances were actually made to a better understanding. The recent address of W. J. Wright before the Baptist Ministerial Association of Cleveland did great good. An equally interesting time was enjoyed by Baptists and Disciples upon invitation of the Baptist Ministerial Association of Philadelphia a week ago. The address of Prof. Willett dealt with the duty of union, and was very cordially received. The negotiations at Rockford, Ill., continue, with prospects that the two churches will become one. Similar efforts are being made in a number of other places. These signs of the times are symptmatic and cheering.

The Visitor

The desire of the Disciples of Christ to perform worthily their part in the work of the kingdom was never more evident than at the present time, nor more clearly displayed than in the noble edifices they are erecting to the glory of God and for the work of the church. Among the most notable of these buildings are those of the Union Avenue Church in St. Louis and the Euclid Avenue Church in Cleveland. Probably these represent no more noble devotion on the part of the congregations erecting them than do many simpler buildings in which taste and sacrifice have combined to produce a worthy result. The modest structures which have been put up in the last few years in such profusion, the more elaborate houses of worship which the more resourceful churches have built, and these beautiful and costly sanctuaries are all in the measure of the ability of their people—an honor to the faith and a credit to the faithful.

The Euclid Avenue Church has a long and honorable history. It was organized October 7th, 1843, with twenty-eight charter members. In its early days the pulpit was supplied by Matthew S. Clapp, Ezra B. Violl, A. P. Green, Wm. Collins, J. P. Robinson, William Hayden, A. S. Hayden, Wm. Lilly and Lathrop Cooley. The regular pastorates have been those of E. H. Hawley, 1864-65; J. Harrison Jones, 1866-68; Dr. L. L. Pinkerton, and his son J. B. Pinkerton, a few months in 1868; C. C. Foote, 1868-70; J. B. Johnson, 1870-71; Jabez Hall, 1872-89; A. N. Gilbert, 1889-91; A. A. Knight, 1892; J. Z. Tyler, 1892-99; J. H. Goldner, 1900. It will thus be seen that the long pastorates in its history have been those of Jabez Hall (seventeen years), J. Z. Tyler (seven years), and J. H. Goldner (eight years thus far, with the prospect of many more to follow.)

The former church was a frame structure erected in 1866, enlarged with a chapel in 1872, repaired in 1887, improved by the addition of a new chapel in 1888 and torn down in 1905. During the erection of the present structure the chapel, moved to the front of the lot, was used for church services. Excavation for the new building began in 1905, the corner stone was laid in May, 1906, the present chapel was occupied in April, 1907, and the completed church was dedicated free from debt April 12th, 1908, by President Miner Lee Bates of Hiram College.

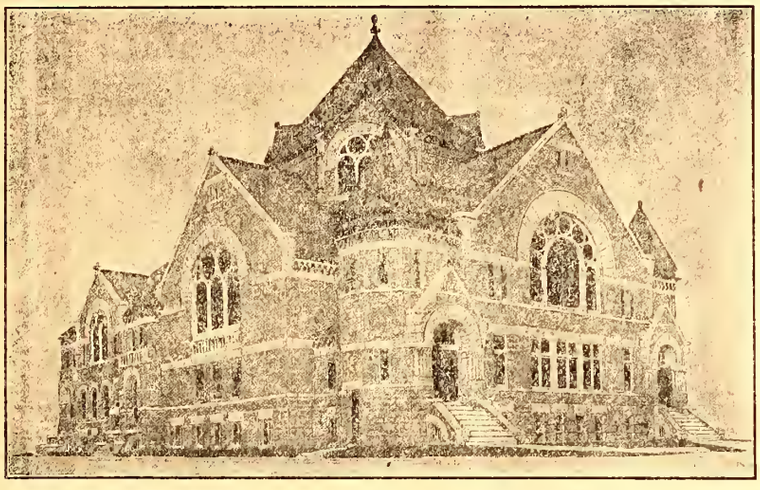
This magnificent result has been brought about by the united labors of J. H. Goldner, the untiring and faithful minister, the Building Committee, of which Judge F. A. Henry, who is also president of the trustees of Hiram College, was chairman, and the membership of the church, which is neither large nor wealthy, but is rich in sacrificial labors for this worthy end. In this noble structure the words of the Psalmist have illustration, "Strength and beauty are in His Sanctuary." The material is of green-grey stone, which presents a most picturesque and pleasing appearance. Within, the finish is of walnut, with pillars and baptismal pool of Sienna marble. The woodwork is hand-carved and massive. The organ is an Estey three manuel electric, with 1341 pipes, 54 stops and couplers. Its cost was $8,000. The total cost of the church was about $114,000.

One of the chief features of the church is the beautiful series of Memorial windows. It would be impossible to describe these in our brief space. There are memorials to many former members of the church, and a few to loved and valued friends who still abide. The designs and coloring are exquisite. The harmony of the light effects, both by day and night, is impressive and satisfying. The chapel is fitted with every device for the most effective Sunday school and other departmental work. The equipment includes complete signal, telephone and even stereopticon service. It is a great religious workshop.

Mr. Goldner is the center and inspiration of this great church. He is in closest touch and sympathy with his splendid official board, which includes some of the most progressive of Cleveland's young business and professional men. The different organizations of the church, especially the two circles of the King's Daughters, are most effective in their labors. The resident ministers who are members of the church are in hearty sympathy with the pastor, and a strength to his work. They include such men as J. Z. Tyler, A. A. Knight, M. L. Streator and B. L. Smith.



EUCLID AVENUE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

One of the joys of a visit to this church is the privilege of talking with J. Z. Tyler. I do not count a year complete in which I fail to make the pilgrimage to his home. It is an inspiration which abides throughout the circle of the months. In appearance he has hardly changed during the past two years. As he lies in his favorite position upon the couch he might be in perfect health. But speech is slow and indistinct, and every movement means an effort, in addition to all that can be done to assist him. Yet he is rarely absent from his place on the Sunday morning, and to my surprise he was present every evening of a series of lectures in the church.

The Tyler home is a cure for the blues. If anyone has a tendency to pessismism. he ought to stay for a few days under this roof. Mrs. Tyler is the same, brave, efficient home-maker as when the stroke first fell which compelled her to undertake the double and difficult task of provider and nurse. With rare patience and courage she has fulfilled every requirement and the result is a home that gives a new meaning to Matthew Arnold's motto, "Sweetness and Light." I was especially pleased to see on the memorial window which loving care has assigned to Brother Tyler in the new church, the words of a text from which I heard him preach a sermon long ago. "Keep yourselves in the love of God." The sunniness, hopefulness and serenity of that utterance are characteristic of that home where love is truth must be told to all men; that is the Gospel. They must learn the privilege and duty of living as children of God; that is Christian living. My prayer is very brief now, to be able to live as a Child of God. Dr. Tyler's mind is as clear as at any time in the days of his strength. The members of the circle of King's Daughters come in and read to him three mornings in the week. He knows the best books of the day, and watches with keen interest every movement of thought among our own people and elsewhere. Every remembrance from his friends and former co-workers is a joy to him. He lives in the sunshine of the coming day. He is keeping himself in the love of God.

Brother Tyler said to me, "I never wanted to preach so much as now. I never had so much to say as now. My creed is very simple. All men are the children of God, that is fundamental. This the consoler and Christ the Great Physician.

The Isolation of Palestine

Frank M. Dowling

It is interesting to see how Judea peculiarly, even among mountain homes, was cut off from the land lying around her.

Space forbids such a description of the "borders and bulwarks of Judea" as the importance and fascination of the theme tempt one to undertake.

As we journeyed along the central range from Jerusalem southward to Hebron and northward to Bethel, whenever our eyes turned eastward we saw our mountain falling away into a yawning and, so far as our vision was concerned, bottomless abyss, beyond which rose the mountains of Moab flinging a high and apparently unbroken line against the sky. We felt that here was surely the origin of the Master's figure of the impassable gulf. As we rode from Jerusalem "down to Jerico" we saw how the mountain descended rapidly from the ridge and precipitously as it neared the floor of the Jordan valley. In making this short journey of some twenty miles we descended nearly twenty-five hundred feet. We were prepared to appreciate George Adam Smith's statement that the Grand Canyon of the Colorado was a mere scratch on the earth's surface in comparison with this Ghor which furnishes the eastern boundary of Judea. When one considers this eastern border of Judea, and the fewness of even possible approaches from the Jordan valley to the table land and takes into account the character of the country through which even these approaches lie, he must be profoundly impressed that Judea was practically inaccessible on the eastern side to a hostile army; and history, including the invasion and settlement of the land by the Israelites, amply justifies that impression. One cannot realize what this eastern boundary of Judea meant in furnishing it the seclusion so necessary to its mission until he has contrasted the history of Judea with the history of Moab "on the other side," which lay "broadside on to the desert" and had no protection against the tides of hostile nomads that kept rolling in from the Arabian peninsula.

The southern boundary of Judea, though very different from the eastern, furnished an almost equally formidable barrier against an invading army. It is true that on the south the Central range lets itself down more gradually as if postponing as long as possible contact with the dreaded desert that stretches away into Arabia. This fact would seem to make Judea easy of access from the south, as Moab is accessible from the east. But in considering the southern defenses of Judea, one must take into account the character of the desert contiguous to the real southern frontier of Judea, which was marked by a line passing through Beersheba. For a distance of sixty miles south of this line nature has thrown up a series of bulwarks composed of steep, forbidding "savage," desert ridges running east and west. This region is called the Negeb—the dry or parched land. The history of the invasion of the land by Chedorlaomer, by Israel, by Islam, and the pressure upon the southern boundary of the Amelekites show how these high and haggard hills formed an all but impassable barrier. The Negeb stood out there staying and dividing the waves of invasion that would have broken in the desert like a great break-water over the land, and turning them eastward over the Jordan valley and westward over Philistia.

From the west Judea was scarcely less inaccessible than from the east and south, Here again a distinction must be made between a real and an ideal boundary. The ideal boundary of Judea on the west was the sea, whose forbidding, harborless coast would have been a great protection to enemies seeking to reach the land by ships. But only in the time of the Maccabees, and even then only at short intervals, did the Jews have possession of the Maratine plain. Even the Shephelah —the low range of loose hills running between the Central range and the sea was as often Philistine as Jewish territory. Now between the Central range and the Shephelah a series of valleys ran all the length of Judea from Ajalon to Beersheba. The formation of the hillside leading from these valleys up to the tableland of Judea is such as to give every advantage in battle to the inhabitants of the hills. The history of Philistine and Syrian and Crusader attacks upon Judea from the west shows that whatever success was attained in reaching the high plateau was due to the carelessness of its defenders rather than to weakness in its natural defenses.

If Judea were as well provided with natural defenses on the north as on the other three sides, its isolation would have been well-nigh complete. The northern border of Judea, though not so well fixed as the others, may be said to be a line running across the tableland ten miles, more or less, north of Jerusalem. The flanks of this northern section of Judea were protected by steep gorges running down eastward to the Jordan and westward to Ajalon. At the most strategic place a line of fortified cities six miles long was stretched across the plateau. At the western end of this line stood Gibeon, commanding the road from Ajalon by Beth-horon; at the eastern end stood Michmash, covering the road from the Jordan by Ai. Three miles to the north from this line of fortresses at the meeting point of the three roads leading up to the plateau from the west, north and east stood the outpost of Bethel, after the exile a fortified city of Judah.

Even this brief examination of the defended and defensible character of the tableland of Judea must impress us with the tremendous task assumed by an invading army that would undertake to dislodge the dwellers from those protected heights.

One of the most valuable chapters in George Adam Smith's monumental book, "The Historical Geography of the Holy Land," is the one entitled, "An Estimate of the Real Strength of Judea." In it he says: "Judea, though not impregnable, has all the advantages of insularity. It is singular how much of an island is this inland province. With the gulf of the Arabah to the east, with the desert to the south, and lifted high and unattractive above the line of traffic, which sweeps past her on the west, Judea is separated as much as by water from the two great continents, to both of which she otherwise belongs. So open at many points, the land was yet sufficiently unpromising and sufficiently remote to keep unprovoked foreigners away. When they were provoked and did come upon her, then they found the waterlessness of her central plateau an almost insuperable obstacle to the prolonged sieges, which the stubborness of her people forced them to make against her capitol and other fortresses."

In estimating the strength of Judea Mr. Smith makes much of the peculiar character of Judea's borders as furnishing compensations for each other's weaknesses. On this point he says: "An invader might come over one frontier and make it his own; but the defeated nation could retreat upon any of the others. In the intricacy of these or of the great desert they could find ground upon which to rally and sweep back upon the foe when he was sufficiently disheartened by the barrenness of the plateau he had invaded. Hence we never find, as far as I know, any successful invasion but one of Judea, which was not delivered across at least three of her borders." One can readily see that it added immensely and almost immeasurably to the difficulty of a successful assault upon the central plateau that the invading army was compelled first to master all of the rest of the land both in order to have a base of supplies and to cut off the defenders of the hill when driven back from one border of retreat to a refuge and fortress upon another.

In considering the Isolation of the Judea plateau we have not yet laid sufficient emphasis on its barrenness and unattractiveness. There is much fertile land in Palestine. The soil of her well-watered valleys as Jordan, Jezreel, Esdraelon—the soil of her lower, softly rolling Samaritan hills, the soil of her plains along the sea is exceedingly rich. The land was capable of supporting an immense population. But the hill country of Judea is rocky, her soil is shallow—a mere "pretense of soil"—her eastern slopes called the wilderness of Judea might as well be called the Dead Land as the sea that washes their naked, crumbling, leprous feet, is called the Dead Sea. Some one has remarked that the land lies there dead, as if it had been stoned to death. The figure is not the best, for the rocks you see are, for the most part, not lying upon the surface as they would be if the land had been pelted with them. The stones are rather outcropping limestone, of which the hills are formed. It is rather a skeleton of a land lying there dead, its flesh decaying and washing away and its bleached bones protruding. This answers only for a general description. It does not do justice to the parts of Judea that furnish pasture for thousands of sheep and goats, and the parts that are and might be terraced and covered with vineyards and orchards. Nevertheless, do you not see how a people might be placed on these high and, we must still say, barren hills and live in an isolation that would be impossible if these hills flowed with milk and honey? Does it not then appear that this high tableland, "enisled" by the natural character of its borders, and removed by its very barrenness and unattractiveness from the cupidity of ambitious nations, was designed by Providence to be the home of a people who would love it, and cling to it, and defend it, and die for it, and who, in the isolation which the land furnished them, were to be so trained that they could be used of God in making Himself known to them?

And now, having seen how the land of Palestine furnished the Chosen People with the seclusion necessary to their preservation and education for a spiritual mission, we are to see how the same land, strangely enough, furnished that contact with the world which supplied a knowledge of it and its needs and invited to world-wide conquest.

MY SYMPHONY.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

To bear the burdens that befall my life
With courage strong,
To greet the woes with which my lot is rife
With gladsome song,
To thwart temptation's power to wreck my soul
With purpose true,
To know beyond the clouds which o'er me roll
Shines heaven's blue.

HOW CAN I?

The old inquiry with which Queen Candice's Treasurer greeted Phillip, the Evangelist, is consciously or unconsciously, audibly or inaudibly on the lips of most of the members in our American churches, and because they cannot understand they do not read. It seems more than strange that this condition should have been allowed to continue until the present day, and that most of the energy of preachers and teachers should have been devoted to explaining isolated passages of God's Word instead of teaching the people how to read the entire book with intelligence and profit.

The new day has dawned. It is more than significant that it comes as a part of the Centennial celebration of the greatest document ever put forth in behalf of God's Word.

Though the new movement is called Teacher Training, and is that, it includes several other desirable ends. The one who takes the course learns to read the Word of God with enjoyment. He gathers the spiritual strength and health that nothing else can supply. He is enriched in conversation and in character. He is prepared to help every individual with whom he talks as well as to preside over and teach a class in the Bible school. Every church should have its class, and every isolated Disciples should take the course by correspondence.

In addition to all the other advantages accruing, what a glorious thing it will be to have a hundred thousand Disciples who are able on the hundredth anniversary of the Declaration and Address to give a reason for the hope that is in them.

Lesson IV. Acts and the Pauline Epistles.

H. L. Willett

The second group of books in the New Testament includes the Book of Acts and the Epistles of Paul. These are grouped together because of their intimate relations. Acts supplies all that we have of the life of the Apostle Paul; the epistles which bear his name give us his interpretation of the gospel.

The Book of Acts is by general consent tributed to Luke, the companion of Paul and the author of the Third Gospel. It was written after the Gospel to which it refers in its opening words. It was addressed to a certain Theophilus, who was probably, like Luke, a Gentile Christian. The sources from which the material of the book have been gathered appear to have been three: (1) the "we sections" (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-16; 21:1-8; 27:1-28:16), in which the first person plural is used. (These passages appear to be extracts from Luke's journal written during his travels with Paul); (2) the narratives regarding the work of Paul in which these passages are embedded, especially chapters 13-28 (The substance of these chapters, as well as chapter 9, was probably communicated to Luke by Paul himself); and (3) the introductory portion of the book, including the most of chapters 1-12 (This section was probably made up of materials derived from the members of the Jerusalem church during Luke's stay in Palestine at the time Paul was a prisoner in Caesarea.)

The purposes of the Book of Acts were (1) to present the story of the life and work of the Apostle Paul, whom Luke regarded as the most notable figure in the church, after Christ; (2) to record the expansion of Christianity under the labors of the apostles, especially Peter and Paul; (3) to show how the Master's great commission was fulfilled in the preaching of the apostles, and how men became Christians in the early church, and (4) to disclose the leadership of the Holy Spirit in the evangelization of the world after the close of Christ's ministry.

The Book of Acts provides a background for the epistles of Paul. By careful study it is possible to see at what points in the narrative of Acts the various epistles are to be inserted, so that the whole becomes The Life and Letters of the Apostle Paul. The epistles were written at various times during his ministry, some of them to churches and some to individuals. They are not arranged in order of their writing, but for the most part in the order of their length.

I.—The First Group.

The earliest of Paul's epistles are those to the Thessalonians. They were written during the second missionary journey to the church in Thessalonica shortly after Paul's departure from that city. Paul was at Corinth at the time of their writing and had just heard from the disciples of Thessalonica by the arrival of Silas and Timothy from that place. The two epistles were written within a short time of each other. They follow Acts 18:5, and the section from 17:1 to 18:5 should be studied in connection with them. They deal with Paul's teachings to the church at Thessalonica while he was there; especially with the subject of the coming of Christ, on which they had not fully understood the apostle. The date of the two epistles is about 50 A. D.

II.—The Second Group.

The epistles of the second group are Galatians, 1 Corinthians, II Corinthians, and Romans. They were written during Paul's third missionary journey. They are usually known as the Doctrinal Epistles, because they deal especially with the great principles of the gospel, such as justification by faith in Christ rather than by the ceremonies of the Jewish law.

Galatians was addressed to the churches of Galatia, probably those of Antioch, of Pisidia, Iconium and Lystra, which were visited by Paul and Barnabas on the first missionary journey. They were in danger of turning away from Paul's teaching to that of Jewish preachers. Paul reproved them sharply for this and defended his authority as an apostle of Jesus. He also insisted that the gospel was free to all, and not to be limited to those of Jewish relationship. The date was probably about 55 A. D. The epistle was written from Ephesus and follows Acts 19:1.

I Corinthians was written from Ephesus toward the close of Paul's three years' residence there. Messengers had come from the church at Corinth telling of its condition. Paul wrote to reprove the members for divisions and other unbecoming conduct, and to make clear to them the impressive principles of the gospel. Its date was about 57 A. D. and it follows Acts 19:20.

II Corinthians was written from some point in Macedonia a short time after the former epistle. Paul had been in great perplexity regarding the Corinthian church, but was partially relieved by the arrival of Titus with news from them. Conditions there were still very much disturbed when he wrote. The time was about 53 A. D. and it follows Acts 20:1.

Romans, the most important of all Paul's epistles, was written after the apostle's arrival in Corinth. It is a strong argument for the principle of justification by faith. Its date was about 59 A. D. and it follows Acts 20:2.

III.—The Third Group.

The third group of Paul's epistles includes Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and Ephesians. These letters were all written from Rome during Paul's imprisonment there. They are often called the church epistles. Philippians was addressed to the church at Phillippi, which had sent him a gift of money by one of its members. Its date was about 62 A. D. and it follows Acts 28:29. Colossians was written to the church at Collosse, which met in the home of Paul's friend Philemon. By the same messenger who carried the epistle he sent also one to Philemon regarding his slave Onesimus. The same messenger was also the bearer of the epistle to the Ephesians. The dates of these three epistles is therefore about 63-64 A. D., and they follow the last verse of the Book of Acts.

IV.—The Fourth Group.

The epistles of the fourth group are generally known as the pastoral epistles, because they deal with the care of the churches. They are addressed to Timothy and Titus, but as it is thought by many that Paul perished at the close of his two years of imprisonment at Rome, it is difficult to determine what their dates and places of writing were, or indeed whether they were written by the apostle in the form which they now have. That some portions of them are from Paul's hand is not doubted.

The apostle must have written other epistles which have not survived to us (See I Cor. 5:9; Col. 4:16). But we may trust that in the providence of God those which were of most value have been spared us.

Later writers used the name of Paul to secure for their writings the attention of the churches. Examples of this pseudo-Pauline writings are found in such works as the apocryphal books, "The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Laodiceans," "The Epistle of Paul to Seneca," "The Epistle of Paul to the Alexandrians," and the "Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians."

Literature—Burton, "Letters and Records of the Apostolic Church"; Hazard-Fowler, "The Books of the Bible"; Willett and Campbell, "The Teachings of the Books"; Gilbert, "The Student's Life of Paul."

Questions.—1, Why are the Acts and the Epistles of Paul grouped together? 2, What are the character and sources of the Book of Acts? 3, What were the purposes of the Book of Acts? 4, What is the connection between Acts and Paul's Epistles? 5, Which of Paul's Epistles belong to the first group, and what is their character? 6, Give the order and features of the second group. 7, What was the occasion which led Paul to write to the Galatians? 8, What are the leading feature of I Corinthians? 9, Describe II Corinthians? What is the theme of Romans? 11, What epistles belong to the third group? 12, What may be said of the fourth group? 13, Did Paul write other epistles which have not survived? 14, What writings falsely claim to be the works of the apostle?

Covetousness is moral theft by one who has not the courage to steal with his hands.

The Sunday School Lesson--The Empty Tomb*

H. L. Willett

The greatest fact of early Christianity is the unquenchable enthusiasm of the first disciples of Jesus in their belief that he was alive and not dead immediately after they had seen him put to death in an agonizing and shameful way. From the cross they went away broken-hearted and despairing men. The Master they loved and trusted had met defeat at the hands of the very people he had come to save. "He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not." There was nothing more to be done but to take the dear, but lifeless and dishonored body, and give it such burial as their poverty and obscurity made possible. In this holy task they received unexpected aid from two men of wealth and estate, Joseph of Aramathea and Nicodemus. It was a sad pleasure to have their Lord remembered in this manner, but it was the only consolation they found in the midst of such dire and appalling bereavement.

THE MYSTERY OF THE RESURRECTION.

What then aroused them in so brief a time to the jubilant pitch of enthusiasm which marked their conduct on the third day following, and to the end of their lives? No explanation short of the assurance of the Savior's resurrection can account for the facts. To all men who asked a reason for their turning of sorrow and despair into confidence and joy they were accustomed to declare that "he rose again from the dead the third day according to the Scriptures." Christ made clear to their minds the fact that he was alive from the dead, and that death had no dominion over him. The manner of this assurance we cannot altogether understand. The voices of faith which give testimony upon this great theme in the New Testament are so tremulous with the glory and mystery of the fact that they do not give us clear vision as to the manner of it. But upon the central theme they are of one utterance, and that is that "Jesus of Nazareth, who was of the seed of David, according to the flesh, was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead."

THE DESPAIR OF THE DISCIPLES.

Next to the reviving faith and courage of the apostles as the result of this event, and incapable of explanation on any other theory, the most convincing proof that Christ rose from the dead is the surprise of his followers at the certainty of his conquest of death. They were charged by the Jews with plotting to remove his body and give out the report that he was alive. How incapable they were of such a plan is shown by their total abandonment of hope, and the panic of weakness and inaction into which they were cast by the event. The last thing of which they were capable was a bold and droit scheme to disguise the facts and impose on the public. In fact so great was their overthrow that they did not even look for the fulfillment of his frequent promises that he should rise from the dead. The Jews remembered his words and set their guard to frustrate any effort at their accomplishment. The disciples thought only of their overwhelming sorrow, and planned nothing.

MARY OF MAGDALA.

To Mary of Magdala was accorded the honor of first seeing Jesus, according to the narrative of the Fourth Gospel. She had come to the sepulchre, after the enforced and abrupt termination of the preparations for suitable burial at the sunset hour of Friday. There was only time for the hasty completion of the mere act of entombment. It was a matter of unusual importance that could lead anyone of the Jewish race to disturb a corpse after it had once been placed in the tomb. All the proprieties were against it, and more than this it was not deemed safe to incur the displeasure of the spirits of the dead by intrusion. For this reason all Jewish funerals took place upon the day of the death, that the lives of the friends might not be endangered by contact with the body after it became the possession of the fierce demons who then claimed it.

THE ALARMING NEWS.

But Mary's love knew no such dangers. Any thought of peril was overshadowed by her anxiety regarding the stone that barred her way to the inner tomb where the Lord lay. When she saw that this rocky door had been rolled back from the entrance, and that the body was not there, a new and absorbing fear took possession of her. The authorities had actually visited the resting place of Christ, and taken away the body. Frantic with this thought, she ran back to the city and told the disciples the terrible news. To none of them had come any hope of the Lord's return. If the body was gone, it was because the precious form had been handled by unfit and profane hands.

PETER AND JOHN.

No one who has ever studied with attention the painting by a French artist entitled, "The Two Disciples, or the Way to the Sepulchre," can ever forget that expressions of tense and fearful eagerness to know the worst. The hands of John, the youth, are clasped in such passionate excitement that the nails seem to be rending the flesh, and on his face there is a look of intensity that seems to defy space in his headlong plunge to be at the place where the mysterious and awful facts are to be learned. Peter, the older man, falling a little behind his more vigorous companion, is the picture of baffled wonder, the veins standing out on face and forehead as he strains forward to know the truth. John arrived first, but with that reverent wonder which held him back, he only stooped over and looked in. When Peter came, however, no moment did he wait, but went in at once to see. Then came John, at last, and when he saw the linen clothes and the napkin, the quiet sepulchre without mark of violence, and the vanished Master, he understood: The Lord was not here; he had risen!

JESUS AND MARY.

The interview of Jesus and Mary is one of the most beautiful in the gospels. No words can make it more significant. One must read it over and over till its wonder and loveliness make their own appeal to his heart. The words of Jesus, "Touch me not, for I have not yet ascended to my Father," seem to warn her away from a mere joy in his visible return which could last for a few days at most. His true place was now in the Father's presence, and his life with the disciples should be no longer the one of familiar friendship, but one of spiritual leadership and comfort. When Mary brought this message to the disciples, a new light dawned upon their lives. The night was far spent, the day at hand.

BETTER THINGS.

Better to feel a love within,
  Than be lovely to the sight,
Better a homely tenderness
  Than beauty's wild delight.

Better to love than be loved,
  Though lonely all the day;
Better the fountain in the heart
  Than the fountain by the way.

Better to be a little wise
  Than learnel overmuch.
Better than high are lowly thoughts,
  For truthful thoughts are such.

Better to have a quiet grief,
  Than a tumultuous joy;
Better than manhood, age's face,
If the heart be of a boy.

Better a death when work is done
  Than earth's most favored birth;
Better a child in God's great house,
  Than the king of all the earth.

The Prayer Meeting--Childhood

Topic for June 3. Mark 10:13-16; Lu. 2;34.

Simeon saw in the child Jesus the force that was to revolutionize religion. He beheld in vision the shattering of popular idols and bringing to honor of types of life esteemed of little worth in his day. History has confirmed Simeon's prophecy. The world has been greatly changed by the Child that the devout old Israelite held in his arms. But our lesson has been imperfectly learned if we have not been taught to see in the child of today the force that is to destroy the despotisms which yet do violence to souls of men and to introduce the reign of the Prince of Peace and righteousness. This work the child will do, provided he receives his inheritance from the right source.

THE RIGHT TO BE WELL BORN.

The editor of Charities and the Commons says: "The new view ,the religious view, the social view, the pyschological view, the rational view of the child from every standpoint is that the right to birth itself must not be abridged. If disease interferes with it, then disease must be overcome. If deliberate crime interferes with it, then crime must be punished. If unscrupulous medical skill interferes with it, that medical practice must be brought more completely under professional ban and criminal prosecution. If ignorance and vicious indulgence interfere with it, then education at an early age by parents and teachers and physicians and others must take the place of the conspiracy of silence. If the employment of women in factories interferes with it, then that employment must be curtailed."

THE RIGHT TO LIFE.

Two hundred years ago seventy-five per cent of the children in London died before their fifth year. Now the percentage is twenty-five. In 1900 the statistics of the United States showed that the death rate for the first year 156 in the thousand. There is reason, then, in the cry for pure milk and proper medical treatment. The greed that destroys child life should be made to appear before men for what it really is. The ignorance that allows children to die for the lack of nourishment and care should be the object of concern for the churches and the state. In the midst of controversies concerning battleships, banks, the tariff, and the trusts, we should bear in mind that if the child is neglected and left to die, the nation will be ruined.

THE RIGHT TO HAPPINESS.

I quote again from Charities and the Commons: "The third element in the new view of the child is that he has a right to be happy, even in school. Pestalozzi and Froebel helped us to think that out. Jane Addams has suggested that one day we shall be ashamed of our present arguments for the prohibition of child labor—that it is physically destructive and educationally disastrous, although these seem like reasonably adequate arguments to start with, and shall recognize that the joyousness of childhood, the glorious fulness of enjoyment for which children are by nature adapted, and by their Creator intended, is in itself a worthy end of legislation and social concern. Bronson Alcot, of whom it is said that his greatest contribution to American literature was his daughter, says that a happy childhood is a prelude to a ripe manhood. It is no artificial, hothouse, forced development of something which might be called happiness that we seek, but the spontaneous growth of a protected, unexploited childhood."

THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION.

The child has a right to be taught the meaning of life. He should have opened to him the wisdom of the ages. President Roosevelt has recently described a kind of multi-millionaire whose son is a fool and whose daughter is a foreign princess. He thinks this kind of a man is a bad citizen. And there are men without millions who fail as ignobly as the millionaires.

Christian Endeavor--Alaska for Christ

Topic for May 31. Isa. 60:11-22.

OUR NORTHERN EMPIRE.

By Amos R. Wells in C. E. World.

Alaska is a great possession. "Seward's Folly," as it was called after the secretary of state had bought it for $7,200,000, had become the pride of the United States.

It is an empire in extent. Its coast line would girdle the globe. Its broad acres would cover all the states east of the Mississippi and north of Georgia and North Carolina. The Yukon is the Amazon of North America. The southern coast has an annual temperature equal to that of Kentucky.

It is an empire in richness. Before long ever our own country, with its supposedly inexhaustible forests, will be compelled to look to the vast woodlands of Alaska, where great pines, cedars, and spruces, and other valuable trees await the uses of men. Fur in great abundance and beauty is to be obtained from the denizens of the forests. The waters swarm with salmon. The seals are famous. The codfish is a coming source of enormous wealth. Coal, copper, and marble are abundant, in addition to the gold that draws the throngs of miners. The first year's output of Cape Nome, that rich goldfield, was equal to the entire cost of Alaska, and more.

All this wealth renders certain a large population in the not distant future; but in the meantime the missionary has problems amply sufficient to occupy his time and strength. The churches will be wise if they press to the conquest of these problems before they are made yet more difficult by the inrush of population. There are the native Alaskans, whose ancestors came over from Asia by way of Bering Strait, the Eskimos and allied tribes, strong and bold, ignorant and superstitious, a ready prey to the vices of the white man and to the craft of the devil doctor, or shaman. There are the remains of the Russian Church.. And there are the crowds of miners, wild and law-abiding, rude and cultured, cleanly and filthy—a motley array of men, with here and there a forlorn or an abandoned woman. Nowhere on earth are missionaries more needed than in Alaska.

Presbyterians sent the first missionaries to Alaska, and it was as recently as 1877. The first missionary was a woman, heroic Mrs. A. R. McFarland, who for seven weary months was the only white teacher in Alaska. The great founder of Alaska missions was Dr. Sheldon Jackson. Another notable missionary was Rev. John E. Brady, who became the first governor of Alaska, and held that position until recently.

INCIDENTS OF THE WORK.

At the Seattle convention, Rev. Edward Marsden of Saxman, Alaska, made this pathetic appeal for his people: "The same ships that bring us our Bibles, our hymn-books, and our missionaries, also bring us barrels and barrels of whiskey and rum to destroy the bodies and souls of our natives. Send us your missionaries, send us your Bibles, send us your hymn-books—but O! my friends, we don't want your whiskey."

A missionary working among the Eskimos says of one village: "Sunday is set aside for rest and worship by the whole village. They sometimes have to go out to look after their nets, but they always try to make it between services. In a workshop on a weekday at any time they may resolve themselves into a prayer meeting."

FEEDING FOR HEALTH.

Directions by a Food Expert.

A complete change in food makes a complete change in body. Therefore if you are ailing in any way, the surest road back to health is to change your diet. Try the following breakfast for ten days and mark the result.

Two soft-boiled eggs, (if you have a weak stomach, boil the eggs as follows: put two eggs into pint tin-cup of boiling water, cover and set off the stove. Take out in nine minutes; the whites will be the consistency of cream and partly digested. Don't change the directions in any particular), some fruit, cooked or raw, cooked preferred, a slice of toast, a little butter, four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with some cream, a cup of properly boiled Postum Food Coffee.

The Grape-Nuts breakfast food is fully and scientifically cooked at the factory, and both that and the Postum have the distaste (that which digests the starchy part) developed in the manufacture. Both the food and the coffee, therefore, are predigested and assist, in a natural way, to digest the balance of the food. Lunch at noon the same.

For dinner in the evening use meat and one or two vegetables. Leave out the fancy desserts. Never over-eat. Better a little less than too much.

If you can use health as a means to gain success in business or in a profession it is well worth the time and attention required to arrange your diet to accomplish the result. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

THE YEUELL MEETING AT POPLAR BLUFF, MO.

Herbert Yeuell has held another great meeting. Poplar Bluff has been stirred as never before on the plea of Jesus Christ. Business and professional men who incidentally dropped in to hear this wonderful man of whom so much had been said, became interested and came night after night to hear his clear presentation of the simple Gospel. Many of them accepted Christ and many more are convinced that they should do so, and will come later. The wonder of it all was that this great evangelist, with the open Bible simply read the Word and called on men to repent. Free from death-bed stories, and hair breadth experiences, he preached a strong practical Gospel, which was accepted by strong practical men. Men who said they had always believed in Christianity, but had been waiting for lightning to strike them, or some feeling to move them to accept the Christ, said, after hearing Mr. Yeuell's sermons, that they now could see God had done his part and it was simply up to them to do their part.

Mr. Yeuell is a great man. "A man among men." To know him is to love him. He is doing a wonderful work and it will grow. The better you know him the stronger he becomes because he preaches nothing but the simple Gospel, and like the Master while on earth, he has a consuming passion for saving souls.

While only 168 took a stand for Christ during this meeting, of less than three weeks' duration, yet it was a great meeting. The good accomplished can not be measured by the number. Hundreds of others have heard the plea of the Christ and will come sooner or later. The meeting in fact had only just begun when it closed, there being 41 responses to the last invitation. The church's mistake was in planning for only a three weeks' meeting with Brother Yeuell in the first place. But several months ago when we engaged him we did not know him as we do now. Had we planned for a much longer meeting and for greater things many hundreds of souls would have been saved in Poplar Bluff. The magnificent new $30,000 church edifice, dedicated only a few weeks ago by Brother Rains, proved entirely inadequate to accommodate those who desired to attend, and scores were turned away each evening that the weather was fit for the people to get out.

On Saturday evening before the meeting closed the large Opera house was taxed to its utmost capacity, with many standing to hear Brother Yeuell on his great lecture, "Ben Hur." The great audience rose en masse on a vote requesting Brother Yeuell to remain at least another week. He very keenly regretted leaving at so critical a time, but his definite promise to San Francisco, where long and elaborate preparation had been made for his coming, necessitated closing his engagement here as scheduled. He will return to Poplar Bluff within a year, when he will erect a tabernacle that will hold the people and plan a campaign for a thousand souls.

There is nothing weak or commonplace about Brother Yeuell. He is absolutely superior—peerless. All deplored the brevity of the meeting because of his great power for good in our community. With all his strength of personality, he believes in organization and systematic plans for work. With all he is a man of God.

Brother Yeuell is ably seconded in his work by Prof. Ralph Boileau, who, under direction, has supervision of plans and music. Boileau excels both as chorus leader and soloist. He is gentle of spirit with a deep sweet voice, optimistic as to the power of the Gospel, throwing into his work a thrilling enthusiasm.

May the good Father bless these splendid workers. The churches that get them should plan for great things. They will more than measure up to the greatest expectations.

W. H. MEREDITH.

PHILADELPHIA.

J. Wilbur Chapman and his evangelists have been with us. For six weeks in a great union simultaneous meeting seventy evangelists and singers held the fort. Four hundred churches representing all the leading denominations in the city participated in the campaign. Meetings were held not only in the churches, but also in theatres, hotels, shops, saloons and on the streets. As far as attendance and interest go the meeting was a great success. The newspapers report that from ten to fifteen thousand cards were signed. No official announcement has been made as to the number. It is the policy of Dr. Chapman not to give out the number of converts in his meetings. The campaign has quickened the pulse of the churches. It is too soon to judge as to its permanent value.

Herbert L. Willett in the absence of Russell H. Conwell in Egypt filled the pulpit of the Grace Baptist Temple Sunday, May 10. On Monday morning he addressed the Baptist ministers, and in the evening spoke at the meeting of the Disciples' Social Union. At the Baptist ministers' meeting Dr Willett spoke on "Christian Union" dwelling especially on the movements toward union between the Baptists and the Disciples. Although the Disciples are little known in Philadelphia the address was most favorably received and provoked much discussion which revealed a great interest in the union of the two bodies. The fraternal spirit of the meeting was most gratifying and encouraging. Almost all agreed that if this spirit had prevailed in the discussion between the Baptists and the Disciples of a century ago we would never have been separated. All agreed that we should now be one people. No one however thought the union could be brought about quickly by the action of a convention, but that it must be the result of a growth. To favor its growth it was urged that wherever possible fraternal relations between the two bodies be maintained. They began at once to practice by extending to our preachers the privilege of membership in the Conference. The meeting was not only a very interesting one, but it also contributed much to the desire for union.

We are getting ready for the Quadrenniel Federation Council which is to meet in this city in December. This meeting will give expression to the unity which already exists among the leading Christian bodies of America, and will give opportunity for the study of the problem. The Disciples of the city are looking forward with great interest to this gathering. It is expected that thirty of our preachers will be in attendance. Never before have we had the privilege of having so many of our ministers with us at one time. We extend a hearty welcome to all the delegates. It will do us good to have you with us.

All of our churches are prosperous. The First, Sixth, and Kensington churches have recently had successful meetings. The Third reports that it has had additions at at almost every service during the winter. Our Social Union meets quarterly for fellowship and the discussion of our common problems. Our last meeting which was addressed by Dr. Willett was the best we have had. Although it was in Philadelphia the attendance, the spirit and the "go" of the meeting would have done credit to the Disciples in any city in the country.

FIT THE GROCER.

Wife Made the Suggestion.

A grocer has excellent opportunity to know the effects of special foods on his customers. A Cleveland grocer has a long list of customers that have been helped in health by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee.

He says, regarding his own experience: "Two years ago I had been drinking coffee and must say that I was almost wrecked in my nerves.

"Particularly in the morning I was so irritable and upset that I could hardly wait until the coffee was served, and then I had no appetite for breakfast and did not feel like attending to my store duties.

"One day my wife suggested that inasmuch as I was selling so much Postum there must be some merit in it and suggested that we try it. I took home a package and she prepared it according to directions. The result was a very happy one My nervousness gradually disappeared. and today I am all right. I would advise everyone affected in any way with nervousness or stomach troubles, to leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A MESSAGE FROM MISSOURI STATE BOARD.

The State Board of the Missouri Christian Missionary Society sends greetings to all the State Societies in our home land.

Next year is our Centennial year and many thousands of our people are expecting to go to Pittsburg to share in the rejoicing in the great convention, and we would not hinder a single soul from participating in this great feast of delight. But we know that many thousands of our people, whose hearts will hunger for a share in that great event, will find it impossible to do so on account of the expense, and for various other reasons. These worthy souls, however, should not be deprived of all fellowship in this season of rejoicing; and at our last Board meeting it was unanimously resolved that we request our sister states to join with Missouri in giving to all of our conventions of 1909, both District and State, such Centennial features as will bring this celebration almost to the door of every Disciple whether poor or rich, distant or near, so that none may feel that they have, for any reason, been deprived of a share in this, the greatest celebration that has ever come to our people.

We would not presume to make any suggestions as to the character of the Centennial features to be introduced at the conventions, your own good judgment will guide you in this. We shall recommend to our state convention that, as far as the state convention of 1909 is concerned, a special committee shall be appointed which shall have full charge of the program.

Believing that you will be happy to join with us in this movement for a larger, more wide spread celebration than otherwise could be, and praying for that favor of our Lord that will make the coming year the best year in all our history, as a people, we are as ever,

W. F. RICHARDSON, President.

WASHINGTON SECRETARY'S LETTER.

Orrick, Rose and McClusky held a fine meeting. Quincy organized by A. J. Adams with 20 members. Wenatchee, 70 in Teacher Training class, largest in the state. Kent—T. J. Shuey organized with 22. Ellis Harris there is a meeting now. Hillman organized year ago with 22; now have 60 members and have purchased location for building. Green Lake—Shuey preached 22 sermons with 17 confessions and eight otherwise. University Place, Seattle, one confession, 6 by letter, one who has been a Baptist minister. $30 raised for Benevolent Association and $50 for hymnals. Hoquiam—Shuey in meeting. Tacoma (Central) F. H. Groom, of Ritzville called as pastor; another strong man for Western Washington. Tacoma (First) 44 additions during April; 1401 at Easter Rally. Elma—Booker Smith has returned from California and accepted the pastorate. Queen Anne, Seattle—four additions during April and will take Home Missionary offering May 10th.

Our convention is to be held in Tacoma June 10th to 21st. We are promised an unusual programme. Three missionaries on vacations from foreign fields are to be here. An Eastern representative of the American Missionary Society and one for the Women's Work, besides our local people. The dedication of the new First Church is planned for the closing day—Lord's Day, the 21st.

As is usual, Tacoma will provide lodging and breakfast. Write me you are coming. Do it now. Let's make this the greatest event in the history of our work. We can do it. We will. We have the greatest plea being made by any people; the Union of all God's people. The Bible our rule of faith and practice, the name of Christ to be worn instead of human names, to speak where the Bible speaks and to be silent where the Bible is silent. The observance of the ordinance of the church as taught in the Bible, the principles of Christianity lived as taught in the word, the Church of Christ instead of any denomination.

This is a great plea and appeals to these Western people who are full of life and energy. They are ready to do great things in religion as well as in other lines. Washington needs the plea of the Disciples. Let the faithful come to Tacoma, June 13-21 and plan great things.

W. A. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

WHERE'S CURLY LOCKS?

O, bring the brush and bring the comb,
For here is little Frowzle-head,
And Father soon is coming home
And must not see a towzle-head!
So we'll brush, brush, brush,
And we'll comb, comb, comb!
Around the finger twirl the hair,
And brush and comb and curl the hair,
Till gone is little Frowzle-head
And Curlylocks is here instead!

The native Christians of Alaska have set their faces like a flint against the old heathen customs. One old man fled from his village to escape the temptation of a native feast, and walked the beach in front of the mission all night, praying.

The singing was led by a chorus of our own young people. In every way the church feels greatly encouraged for the work of the future by the earnest, faithful preaching and labors of Brother Sinclair and the successes he has wrought for the Kingdom of God.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now Be Tested in Your Own Home

Deaf or partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone on payment of a small deposit. This is unusually important news for the deaf, for by this plan the final selection of the one completely satisfactory hearing aid is made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

Mrs. C. Lidecka, 238 12th Ave., Maywood, Ill., wears an Electrophone less conspicuous than eyeglasses.

This new invention U. S. Patents Nos. 858,986 and 855,458, renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing, and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A MILLIONAIRE'S OPINION

STOLZ ELECTROPHONE CO., Chicago.—I am pleased to say that the Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size and great in hearing qualities makes it PREFERABLE TO ANY. I can recommend it to all persons who have defective hearing.—M. W. HOYT, Wholesale Grocer, Michigan Avenue and River Street, Chicago.

ANOTHER UNION MEETING.

I am in a union meeting here in Southwest City, Mo., a town of 800 to 1,000 population with the Christian, Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist churches. Brother F. M. O'Neal and wife of Springfield are assisting me as singers and personal workers. We began last Sunday in the Baptist church with an audience which has steadily grown, filling the building. Today we moved into the Presbyterian church, where we have more room and had a full house at both our morning and evening services. In our service today we had a Sunbeam chorus of 80 little folks from the different Bible school classes of the city, beside an adult chorus of 30 singers. Brother and Sister O'Neal are doing splendid work with our chorus classes. Next Sunday we go to the Methodist church, where we will have the largest building in the city and where we will continue our meeting to its close as the Christian church has no church building, they having met with the misfortune of losing theirs by fire some years ago. They are hoping this meeting will enable them to rebuild and if it proves what we are hoping for, we will endeavor to raise money for a new building before we leave the city.

The little band of 20 disciples worshipping here in the Baptist church has had a struggle to maintain an existence since the destruction of their property and only for the Christian courtesies shown them by the other churches of the city, would have long since been dead. Since coming here I have preached nothing but the "Old Jerusalem Gospel," and have not had a single unkind criticism, so far as I know. I am learning more and more that it is not so much what you say as how you say it that affects the people favorably or unfavorably. I am also learning that the fellow who goes about with a chip on his shoulder will usually find some one to knock it off. Meet the people in a spirit of love and though they differ from you in teaching they will meet you in the same spirit. I am open for engagements with churches wanting meetings and will make terms to meet their financial conditions.

Old Jack.

BY PAUL SUTER.

The very first day she was in the country, Ellen saw old Jack. He stood in the middle of the north pasture and bellowed at her, with his head down and two little horns sticking out on either side.

"Would he hurt us if we went in?" Ellen asked, wonderingly.

"He'd eat us right up," answered little

Georgie, who was only four, but had lived in the country all his life.

"Then I'm not going near him," said Ellen decidedly. "I don't like bulls at all, if that's what they do."

That evening she asked Uncle John whether old Jack was really as bad as Georgie had said. Her uncle nodded his head in a queer way and smiled.

"If you got in front of him when his chain was off, you'd think so. He broke away last summer, and it took three of us to chase him back into the field. I was glad, that day, that I had a good club with me."

"And can he run fast?" Ellen inquired, in an awe-stricken voice.

"If he ever takes after you, you might as well stand still, and wait for him. He'd catch you anyway. But sometimes bulls won't touch a person who doesn't run."

Ellen made up her mind on the spot, that she would never try to find out whether old Jack would touch her or not He was altogether too ugly and bad-tempered to be trifled with. But nearly every morning she would go down to the north pasture to look at him, from a safe place behind the fence.

One morning she went there, as usual, with little Georgie, and old Jack was not to be seen.

"I know why," said Georgie, clapping his hands. "Papa said he was going to sell him, and now he's done it. The mean old thing can't scare us any more."

"Then we can go into that field just the same as any other!" cried Ellen. "I'm so glad, because"—she whispered into Georgie's ear—"Uncle John says there are mushrooms there. Let's look for some right away, so that we can take them back for dinner."

Georgie agreed willingly, and in a trice they were over the fence. Ellen felt as brave as could be, now that old Jack was gone. She peered to right and left on the ground, and presently, sure enough, she saw a round, white mushroom peeping up at her. At the same moment Georgie found one, too, and as they went farther into the field, there were others. Ellen had lifted her pinafore, to serve as a basket and it was really becoming almost full.

Suddenly Georgie dropped the mushroom he had just found with a shriek.

"Look!" he cried. "He was there all the time! He's coming right at us, now!"

Ellen looked toward the other side of the pasture, and there was old Jack! He was coming at a steady trot, with his eyes fixed full upon her and Georgie.

"Run, Georgie!" she shouted; and then she remembered her uncle's words. It was no use to run. "I know what I'll do," she said to herself, with a little tightening of the lips. "I'll stay here; then he won't touch Georgie, even if he does hurt me."

The bull came on, at the same slow trot. Ellen was trembling, but stood her ground bravely. Presently a shout told her that Georgie had reached the fence. A second shout, and—she gave a cry of joy; it was her uncle's voice. In another moment she felt quite indignant, because he was laughing at her, and coming across the field without any hurry at all; and what was stranger still, the bull had stopped and begun to nibble the grass.

"Oh, I'm so glad you came!" Ellen sobbed, with her uncle's arm around her. "Old Jack was coming straight toward us, but I didn't run because I wanted Georgie to reach the fence first."

For reply, Uncle John took her hand and led her right up to the big animal in front of them.

"Do you see who it is?" he asked, mischievously.

Ellen stared a moment; then her tears changed to laughter.

"Why, it's only our old Bessie cow!" she cried. "And I thought I was so brave."

But her uncle was not laughing now. He looked down at her admiringly.

"I still think you are," he said.

Reds and Blues Contest Buttons

REDS AND BLUES Contest plans have proved wonderfully successful in Y. M. C. A. work and are proving more so in Sunday school work. By making use of our Reds and Blues plans you can easily double your school membership in a month or six weeks. You can break up irregular attendance in a very short time. You can raise large sums of money for your needs. You can secure church attendance, bringing of lesson helps, bringing of collection, coming on time.

The Reds and Blues plans please because they set everybody at work heartily and enthusiastically and because each leaves the school in a healthy condition when the contest is ended.

Each Reds and Blues plan requires dividing the school into two sections—Reds and Blues and appointing captains, one or more, for each side, a social or other treat to be given at the close of the contest, when those on the winning side receive ice-cream and cake, and the losers crackers and cheese, or some other attraction to celebrate the close of the contest and the victory. Treat is to be paid for by the school. Complete instructions sent with each order.

Price, in lots of 10 or more (sent assorted, one-half each color), 1½c each, postpaid; 50 or more, 1c each, postpaid.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net. postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus; etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

THE CHALLENGE TO MEN

Jesus Christ was a man; he committed his gospel to men; he looks to men to-day to lead in winning the world to him. Christianity is a masculine religion; it appeals to the militant, the virile, the aggressive that is in manhood at its best . And men as men are waking up to these facts. Christian ministers to-day are emphasizing their common manhood more, and their priesthood less, than probably ever before in the Christian era. A prominent New York City minister said from the platform of the first Presbyterian Brotherhood Convention that he had never before seen so many ministers in short coats trying to pass themselves off as men! He was speaking in obvious congratulation of that fact, rejoicing that ministers are now more than ever working as men among men, shoulder to shoulder with their fellow-men in the warfare that demands the life of whole men. —*S. How to Conduct a Sunday School

MARION LAWRENCE

Suggestions and Plans for the Conduct of Sunday Schools in all Departments—Filled with Details, Specific and Practical — Valuable Information.

Dr. Jesse L. Hurlbut says: "The actual experiences and plans of a working superintendent who has given his whole heart and mind to his work. There is very little of theory and much of practice."

This book might be termed an encyclopedia of Sunday School wisdom, written by the most experienced writer in the field. The author is secretary of the International Sunday School Committee, has visited schools in every part of the world and compared ideas with more workers than any other person in the land. Consequently there is a broadness of vision and treatment that makes it as useful to one school as another.

EDITORIAL

DELEGATE CONVENTIONS.

The more the question is pondered and discussed the more apparent it becomes that the plan of making our conventions, district, state and national, delegate bodies, grows in favor. In the development of this sentiment there is no disposition to criticise or underestimate the value of the conventions which have followed the older method. It would have been difficult, perhaps, to provide for any other than merely mass gatherings in earlier times. The churches were not so numerous, and there was fear that there might grow up some centralized power, which was more feared than any disorder that might ensue.

To-day the situation is different. It is clearly seen that our conventions cannot be truly representative unless the churches, which are the units of power in the brotherhood, have some method of expressing themselves. This they can only do when when they send regular delegates to the gatherings, at which the interests of all are considered. As has often been pointed out, our conventions, as at present constituted, are only gatherings called by the missionary societies of such as are interested in missionary work and care to respond to the call. Strictly speaking, they have no voice on any other questions, and if they should wish to speak upon such themes as the destruction of the liquor traffic, the abolition of war, the social redemption of cities, the purification of politics, the improvement of the press, or the reunion of Christendom, they have no speech nor language in which to make themselves understood. If a resolution of this sort is introduced, there is no reason why it should be regarded as a legitimate topic for resolutions in a strictly missionary convention, and any delegate might well protest against its introduction as irrelevant and ungermane material. But even if such a resolution were passed, it would have no value beyond an expression of opinion on the part of the group that happened to be present. It could never be said that the Disciples as a brotherhood had made any expression of opinion on any subject.

But a far more serious side of the question is the responsibility of the churches as to -day felt and as it would be if our conventions were representative. At the present time the churches feel only the mildest sense of interest in the conventions. If the preacher wishes to go and will pay his own expenses and supply his pulpit, there is no particular objection. Few churches think of sending their minister as an act of simple justice and self-expression. If others than the preacher go, it is wholly the result of individual choice. If any of those who should thus chance to go bring back to the church a report of the convention work, it is by accident rather than of set purpose. Thus the church as such feels no responsibility for the welfare of the convention, and only a mild concern to learn anything of what was done.

The representative convention would change all this. Every church in the brotherhood would be expected to send at least one delegate and as many more as its membership would entitle it to have, at the rate, say, of one additional delegate for each two hundred members. It goes with the saying that the minister would naturally be one of the delegates chosen. In most fair-minded churches, when the question was thus brought forcibly and regularly to their attention, the expenses of the minister would be provided. This ought always to be the case. In many instances other members, who by loving and faithful service were entitled to such a privilege, but unable to afford it, could be sent. It would be an epoch in their lives, and in return a blessing to the church. After the convention the inspiration that would be brought to the church by the reports of these members would more than repay it for the cost of their being sent.

But more than all this, the church itself would feel responsible for the purposes, ideals and aims of the convention in a manner quite unknown today. At the present time no church feels that it speaks in these gatherings or that it is in any direct sense obligated by the plans drawn up for the advance of the kingdom. To fill churches with this sense of responsibility would be to quicken the entire brotherhood and bring it into closer and more responsive harmony.

That the sentiment in favor of delegate conventions is growing is evident to even casual observers. Districts and states are incorporating this feature in their constitutions and it is increasingly apparent that such a step in our national convention would be timely, effective and in harmony with our desire to use all our forces in the most direct and fruitful way. Within a year of our centennial, it is time that we left off the garments of childhood and put on those of maturer years.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S CONCEPTION OF IMMORTALITY.

It is true labors which are now laid on us for food, raiment, outward interests, cease at the grave. But far deeper wants than those of the body are developed in heaven. There it is that the spirit first becomes truly conscious of its capacities; that truth opens before us in its infinity; that the universe is seen to be a boundless sphere for discovery, for science, for the sense of beauty, for beneficence and for adoration. There new objects to live for, which reduce to nothingness present interests, are constantly unfolded. We must not think of heaven as a stationary community I think of it as a world of stupendous plans and efforts for its own improvement. I think of it as a society passing through successive stages of development, virtue, knowledge, power, by the energy of its own members. Celestial genius is always active to explore the great laws of the creation and the everlasting principles of the mind, to disclose the beautiful in the universe and to discover the means by which every soul may be carried forward. In that world, as in this, there are diversities of intellect; and the highest minds find their happiness and progress in elevating the less improved. There the work of education, which began here, goes on without end; and a diviner philosophy than is taught on earth reveals the spirit to itself, and awakens it to earnest, joyful effort for its own perfection.

THE PATH IN THE WOODLAND.

There's a path leading into the forest,
Where the maples are shady and tall,
Where the midsummer sun cannot enter,
And ever the cool shadows fall;
When my spirit is restless and burning
From the heat and the toil of the day,
I enter and leave care behind me,
And follow the path far away.

In the heart of the woodland I tarry,
Enthralled by the flowers and the trees,
Where the haunts of humanity call not,
In the low whispering notes of the trees;
Discontentment has flown like a shadow,
When the clouds give the sunlight release,
And the silences hold me forever,
In the clasp of an infinite peace.

Correspondence on the Religious Life

George A. Campbell

The Correspondent: "I was interested in your reflections on Christian Science in last week's CENTURY. The unity of the Christian Science movement has impressed me most favorably One spirit seems to permeate the whole body. This unity, to my mind, is greatly preferable to the discords often found in our more evangelical churches. Can there be any explanation for this unity other than it is the result of the truthfulness of its position"?

The present unity of the Christian Science movement is such which usually characterizes the initial stage of a new religius prpaganda. The devotees of a new cult or a new denomination are invariably brought into very close sympathy with one another. The tenets they have come to profess seem to them to be stimulatingly satisfying, grandly comprehensive, and all explanatory. In their devotion to their faith they eagerly seek the whole world as converts. The spirit of foreign war and of active proselyting assures, at least for a time, an inner unity. Again in the early stages of a religious movement some dominating mind is the mind of all. Christian Science is as yet an autocracy. But such unity will not last. When the democracy of Christian Science begins to calmly think—and the democracy in the long run always asserts itself— it will find that its tenets are not grandly comprehensive nor all-explanatory. In trying to square the experiences of life with its faith it will begin to doubt, deny and disagree. No ultimate unity will be reached on philosophical grounds, much less on grounds of irrational philosophy. The way of unity is the way of love. Christian Science thinking and dividing will be greater than the present autocratic Christian Science. Unity is best; but division is better than death.

The Correspondent: "Why can't all our preachers be 'middle-of-the-road' men? They are not disquieting. What is the need of constantly disturbing the truth? We ought to let well enough alone. I do not like the disturber."

Luther was not a "middle-of-the-road" preacher; nor was Wesley, Calvin, Zwingle, Knox nor Campbell. Christ made a radical departure from the middle-of-the roa of his time. He left it at right angles. Paul followed him. Most of us are in the middle of the road because it is well worn and easy to travel therein. But the unpicked fruit is frequently to one side. It is only as men have left the beaten path that the world has become enriched by discovery.

If I could have my way I would have progress come in the most gradual and peaceable way. I do not like revolutions, or even disputes. I would have religious enlightenment come so imperceptibly to all that there would be constant growth with no jarring noise. This I take it is the middle-of-the-road man.

But history's way is not my way. It has its thunderings and lightnings and its awful cataclysms. I like Luther at this distance; but I think I would not have drawn nearer to him than the outskirts of the crowd when he touched the match to the Papal Bull. After he has proved himself by a hundred years I find myself a follower of Alexander Campbell. I feel, had I heard him, I would have feared to follow his pioneering. He would have appeared too reckless with the sacred accumulations of the past. His logic may have convinced me, but I confess I think would have kept on with the traditional. The movement seems safer when it has gathered numbers. The most of us are poor-sea men. It is only the rare soul that raises the anchor in his home harbor and pushes out upon the sea of infinite reachings. And ah, many of these sail on and on with no compass to guide. On the Infinite Sea will there be a harbor for every daring sailor-soul?

I am growing to pay daily homage to our forefathers. Not that I read them much, for they wrote to a different atmosphere than ours. Their charm to me is that they spoke what was in their hearts, counting not the cost. Their chief value is not in what they said, but the spirit of courage with which they said it. They were outspoken gentlemen. They were honest with themselves and with all men. They were not policy men, but princely men. They were not middle-of-the-road men; but we their followers are. We are the weaker breed. They swung the ax. We run the lawn mowers. They traced and slew the wild beasts of the forest, while we are timid when away from the well traveled road. The spectres of the darkness make us nervous. Where are we to get our strong breed of men from in the future if all the pioneering has been done? Who are the followers of the pioneers of the past? Their descendants who live in palatial homes, or those who are still "blazing paths where highways never ran"?

Our fathers were religious pioneers. May their breed never die!

As our fathers had their problems, we have ours. Ours were not theirs. Ours are our own. We have materials at hand that they never dreamed of. Science and criticism demand readjustments. Since the time of Christ no change in human thought has been commensurate with that which challenges the church today. No preacher who reads and thinks can long ignore this. There must be readjustment.

Discussion and investigation must continue. The way out is not the way of silence. The closed mouth is as dangerous as the rashly-opened mouth. The head cannot be liberal and the tongue conservative. If so the ministry will lose its conscience, and when that goes all that is vital has gone. It is said frequently, "You may believe it, but do not preach it." That advice must be given with discriminate care. Thousands of pulpits lack power today because te vital beliefs thought in the study are not declared in the pulpit. If the preacher is over-zealous about the temper of his audience he may miss the burning message of the truth of God. The pulpit must ever be possessed with the spirit of abandon. It will never have this adjustable spirit if it studiously and determinately seeks to be in the middle of the road, nor if it seeks to follow wayward paths. It is not the truth that needs to be disturbed; but error that ever blocks the way of truth. The Gospel needs a free course in order to be glorified.

Upgoing Through Pain.

One of the elements of our upgoing is pain. The middle-of-the-road adherent fears that his more venturesome brother will be lost in the marshes of doubt; while the latter fears that the former will lose the fulness of life because breathing the dust of the past. Sometimes these two elments are in the same church, and if love does not triumph friction results, and the church of Christ contends over its conceptions of Him. Sometimes father and son are caused to grieve for each other. The faith of the older grows more precious with years; while the younger is reckless in the strength of his youth. We should avoid unnecessary pain. We cannot avoid growth; but growth towards God is always reverential. Reverence exercises great care in its demolishing. It builds before it ears down. But there will be some pain, especially where the accentuation has been placed upon doctrines bound to pass rather than on the satisfying Person who ever abides.

My Father and Son.

I am thinking of two who are most closely related to me, my father, who is ninety, and my son, who is nine. I sometimes wonder if I have caused the former pain because differing from him in some of my religious views. He has never said so. But his religion is everything to him, and the plan of salvation is to him very definite and plain. So it must grieve him sometimes to think I do not see it exactly as he does. He thinks the kingdom has not yet been set up; I think it exists wherever God's will is done in man. He thinks man is not naturally immortal, but becomes so by accepting Christ; I think every man is the child of God and therefore to live alway. He thinks the soul sleeps between death and the resurrection. I believe it goes to God and lives consciously on. He believes the devil is to be chained for a thousand years. I believe his chains are already being forged, by which he is to be chained forever. He believes in the infallible inspiration of the Word. I believe in the inspired prophet and aspostle. He believes that Christ came to satisfy the justice of God. I believe he come as the unrestrained expression of God's heart. Does my father grieve because of my departure from his cherished doctrines? I suspect he sometimes does. But he also rejolces that we pray together, that the same Christ that we worship is our common hope, and that by His word of life He has kept us to what is moral, earnest and purposeful. It would be painful, indeed, if our differences had caused a weakening of our love for one another; but such is not the case, nor should it ever be. I am a follower of my father, not that I always agree with him, but that I try to be true to my highest light, as he has been during his long life, to his. My view-point, I think, is true; but I shall be satisfied if it proves to be as comforting as my father's and as vital. Will my son move out beyond my firmly held views and some day cause me pain? Will he tear down my theological buildings till through tears I behold them in ruins at my feet? The other day I told him for the first time the story of Jonah. At the conclusion he said: "That is all true, I think, but the whale part." That showed a daring that I thought might mean pain to me when my opinions perchance are all crystallized, and when faith is no longer something to argue about, but to trust for "the last long mile." But if he comes to believe in a Christ that keeps him good, should I grieve if he finds that some of my theological clothes do not fit him?

Let our sentence this week be from Sabatier, "God has no need to be brought back to man and reconciled with him; but it is man who needs to be reconciled to God."

I commend his, "The Atonement."

The Centrality of Palestine

Frank M. Dowling

Geographically and historically considered the position of Palestine was central in the ancient world. Syria, and the figure might have been limited to Palestine, has been called the bridge between Asia and Africa—a bridge with a sea of water on one side and a sea of sand on the other. What individuals, what caravans, what tribes, what armies have crossed that bridge! When the curtain of authentic history is rolled up we see dwellers along the Nile and those who lived between the two great rivers passing and repassing on this bridge. Later on we see Assyrian and Egyptian, then Persian and Egyptian armies surging back and forth over this bridge and drenching it with blood. Whatever exchanges of courtesy took place between the two ancient seats of empire—Egypt and Western Asia—the royal equipage crossed over this bridge. Over this bridge passed the trains of merchants going back and forth between Egypt and Babylonia, and Persia, and even India. And later on, when the continent of Europe became aggressive and pushed her conquests into the Orient, though the figure of the bridge may have to be dropped, Palestine was found to lie in the natural pathway between the west and the east. Perhaps our bridge may be considered as a swinging bridge. Alexander the Great reached Egypt through Palestine, and Napoleon got as far as Palestine on his way to the Euphrates and the Indus, where he had dreams of empire.

I have a feeling that Palestine might more appropriately be called the hub than the bridge, for in it center the great highways of the ancient world. "All roads lead to Palestine" would be a truer saying than "all roads lead to Rome." There was the road from Damascus to the Mediterranean, the famous "Way of the Sea." The great south road diverged from the "Way of the Sea" at the Lake of Galilee, and was the road into Egypt. The great East Road ran down the valley of Jezreel, crossed the Jordan at Bethshan and stretched away across Gilead into Arabia. The travelers and merchants and armies of three continents passed back and forth along those highways. The life of the world throbbed through those great arteries.

It must be that many would think that I have been making impossible and mutually exclusive claims for Palestine as the providential land. How can it be that one small land could furnish at the same time seclusion from the world and contact with the world? The answer is of the greatest importance. The secret lies in the division of the land into mountain and plain. The highways ran through the plains. The people lived on the hills. The tides of the world's life swept through the great plains of Palestine at the feet of her high and, in some cases, unattractive hills. Judea especially seems like a high, secluded seat reserved by Providence for a people whom he desired to witness the drama which the nations were enacting on the stage of the Palestine plains—and Judea was the home of the real Jews, the seat and center and source of the religious ideas and ideals of the nation.

Since the case I am trying to make out hinges on the explanation I am now making, I feel that my statements should be buttressed by high authority. In my mind George Adam Smith is the highest. I quote from him. "We now see why the Maritime Plain was so famous a war-path. It is really not the whole of Palestine which deserves that name of the bridge between Asia and Africa; it is this level and open coast-land along which the embassies and armies of the two continents passed to and fro, not troubling themselves, unless they were provoked, with the barren and awkward highlands to the east. So Thothmes passed north to the Hittite frontier and the Euphrates. So Rameses came. So, from 740 to 710, Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, and Sargon swept south across Jordan and Esdraelon to the cities of the Philistines, entering Samaria, whose open gateways they found at Jenin and Kakon, but leaving Judah alone. So, in 701, Sennacherib marched his army to the borders of Egypt, and detached a brigade for the operations on Jerusalem, which Isaiah has so vividly described. So Necho went up to the border of Assyria, and Nebuchadnezzar came down to the border of Egypt. So Cambyses passed and left Judea alone. So Alexander the Great passed between his siege of Tyre and that of Gaza, and passed back from Egypt to Tyre, entering Samaria by the way to punish the inhabitants of Shechem. So the Antiochi from Syria and the Ptolemies from Egypt surged up and down in alternate tides, carrying fire and rapine to each other's borders. From their hills the Jews could watch all the spectacle of war between them and the sea—years before Jerusalem herself was threatened.

It is granted that the Jews, as a nation, failed to grasp the high spiritual character of the kingdom of God. Nevertheless, under the hand of God, they builded more wisely than they knew, for they laid the foundations of the final, the universal religion. Their conception was that the House of the Lord should be established in the top of the mountain, and that all nations should flow into it, as they had seen all nations from the ends of the earth flowing along the roads that skirted their high hills. The true conception was in part the reverse of this, for while the House of the Lord was to be established (and they were establishing it) on the top of the mountain, it was to flow out to all the peoples who had passed by under their hills to and from their far-away homes, and to nations yet unborn, for the hill-top vision of their prophets was that Jehovah's name should be great from the rising of the sun even to the going down of the same. So when in the fullness of time the Fulfiller of all that the prophets had spoken and the Founder of the universal religion came into the world, in the supreme moment of his life he said to his disciples, "Go teach all nations."

O near lights, and far lights,
And every light a home!
And how they gladden, sadden us
Who late and early roam!
But sad lights and glad lights,
By flash and gleam we speed
Across the darkness to a light
We love, and know, and need!

One Day in India

Adelaide Gail Frost

This is no great story; busy people, "very, very busy" people, will not find it paying to read this. It is true in every detail and it is just the day upon which I am writing, not in any way uncommon and yet I sometimes think that never a day passes that does not record its own particular event, distinguishing it from all the other days of the calendar, if we will but look a little beneath the surface. It is March and the morning is like a lovely June morning in Hiram. Some reader may, like me, feel nothing more can be said in nature's praise. My mother's verbena bed is a mass of snow and roses, several beds of pansies are rich with bloom, modest mignonettes and spicy nasturtiums speak of my far away first home. These flowers someway seem to take away something from the sordidness of the life we so frequently see and touch.

It is a sweet Lord's day morning, the girls are preparing for Sunday school, my old woman tells me that my cart has come to take me to make some visits in the town. One of our married daughters, Kumaniya, is going with me because I shall visit some of her friends this morning. Though it is not eight o'clock I must wear my sun-helmet, for the actinic rays of the tropical sun are as busy on Sunday as on other days.

We pass through the busy streets of the town, India's "busy," slow, creaking ox carts with misshapen, top-heavy loads, porcupine loads of bamboos or crooked saplings and crazy twigs, high piled sacks of cotton or wheat or rice, on to the ever sordid scenes of the bazaar. Even on our main streets are unsightlly ruins and heaps of bricks, unbaked save by the sun and crumbling to dust. Dust, dust settling on everything, on the open baskets of flour and sugar and salt, sifting into the bags of grain and spices, sticking to the trays of shiny, greasy sweet-meats. I wonder sometimes if I have ever seen a street where naked brown children do not roll in the dust, where wretched pariah dogs do not thrust their lean, sore decorated bodies near you, where a leper, or a beggar with some disgusting deformity, is not the one who most cordially salutes you! One so often sees the unlovely side of India in the bazaar, life seems so mean, so petty, so poor, so "of the earth-earthy." We turn up a narrow street, we appear to be about to cut off the corner of a broken wall but, as usual, escape and we stop in front of a house well known to us. There is a gunny-sack portiere, an old, bent, brown woman, thrusts her head out and bids us welcome. We go in and find a bright girl of twelve, perhaps, two young women, two old ones, and the mother of the twelve year old. There is a young son, too, and a lively baby boy who brings me his broken doll to mend. I tie its head on with the most intricate knot known to me, which the youngster quickly solves and returns my failure to me. In a month, I am informed, one of the girls is to be married. I thought she was married, she was of such an age that courtesy forbade my being inquisitive. A very, very "old maid" for India, being quite sixteen I should say. The older relatives groaned for they told me it would take six hundred rupees ($200), anyway, to marry her, i. e., entertaining the bridegroom's party, etc. I thought of yesterday, when a young teamster told me it would take five hundred rupees to entertain the guests to his sister's wedding, and the combined wages of the rather large family amount to some two dollars a week, at most three dollars. The prospective brides must hear the groaning over the expense of their "marrying off" and this one looks especially bored. I was told I was to be invited to the wedding. We read and sang together (three know how to read now), and when we arose to go we found an embassy from another house, a boy and girl, to ask us to be sure and come to their house. The mother we found looking sad and careworn. They are a good family, the father having a government office. She told me her trouble at once. Her younger brother was insane. She asked me pathetically if insanity were ever curable. She said he was in the Alizarh Indian College and over-study had caused insanity. They hoped so much from him and no money would be spared to effect a cure. We comforted her as best we could and read and sang of our Helper.

My home mail came to me enroute home. How eagerly I always look for my father's handwriting on at least one envelope (and seldom have I been disappointed in my more than ten years in India). The precious letter has come and one from my India mother, Miss Graybiel, and a letter from the Hiram Home-Coming Committee, which makes me feel I have still a little place on the dear old hill. I come home and open my papers, The Century and Evangelist, while The Standard, too, has come to Miss Burgess. How I enjoy your visits, dear CHRISTIAN CENTURY, and of other of our leading journals. Brother Brown did not visit Mahoba; he certainly would have found some of the home periodicals here that are published by our people.

We are glad Bros. Hamilton, Garmong, Huffman and Hall visited us. They brought cheer and courage by their recitals, sermons and compaionship. We are "back numbers" in some respects, we hear little of the great world-doings through our ears and sometimes eyes get tired of looking at the characters of a stranger land. Our brethren need to pray for us that we do not grow narrow and dictatorial. The CHRISTIAN CENTURY has helped me by its visits and by books. We feel our church papers are capable of and in a position to do the cause of missions the greatest good.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY will believe me when I say that the Christian Standard was our library largely on the northern plains when my dear father was a home missionary. It was not the least, but one of the greatest blessings of our remote home. It came in the most brotherly manner with the ever welcome Christian Evangelist, and my father took the CHRISTIAN CENTURY's parent, the Christian Oracle, from its first number I believe. The three papers were meat for our faith. This is all believed to be apropos of the home mail.

After our eleven o'clock meal, when Miss Burgess and I talked of our mail, I came to my room to find an eager married daughter who had just received a letter from her husband, from whom I had also heard. We met each other with glad tears just back of our eyes because we knew that yearning prayers we had offered every day to God for her husband had been beautifully answered. He had wandered from Jesus and gone to the Hindu sect, the "Arya Sumay." He wrote me a rare letter saying that since two weeks his heart, that he thought could never change, had done so completely; he wants to be Jesus' only. He said: "I have been indeed a prodigal son; I will return poor in truth, save in this world's goods." He is on the electric car line in Caunpore. We will have a praise service tonight for answered prayer.

I spent my afternoon till the four o'clock church service looking over the letters in my rack, that should have been answered before and even now could not be answered, a few kept in that list that were answered years ago, but I keep them that they may warm my heart again.

There were special prayers at church today for the convention in Jubbulpore. The beautiful new Bible College was dedicated last Friday. Mr. Gordon is not here and one of my teachers, a slow young man who preaches, if slowly, shortly.

Our evening meal is over and my letter to the CENTURY done, but the mother and father far away must have their bit and then I must try to go to sleep without thinking too much of outlines of Indian history that must be presented to a class tomorrow. I wish our beloved Prof. Dean had made Indian history a specialty for outline now. He forced us to remember by fine outlines of history lessons. The wars that have devastated this land from the time of Alexander to the Amir of Afganistan are many, the Marathas of Poona and the warlike tribe of Haiderabad; do you knew them?

ADELAIDE GAIL FROST.

These frequent looks of the heart to heaven exceedingly sweeten and sanctify our other employment and diffuse somewhat of heaven through all our actions. Solemn prayer, at fit times, is a visiting of God; but this were a constant walking with Him all the day long, a lodging with Him in the night.—Robert Leighton.

Lesson V. The General Epistles and Revelation

H. L. Willett

The General Epistles include Hebrews, 1 Peter, James, Jude, 2 Peter, 1 John, 2 John and 3 John. They are called General because they were not from one writer like the Epistles of Paul. They were written at various times during the apostolic age. They were probably but a small portion of the correspondence between the first messengers of Jesus and the churches and individuals in whom they were interested. But persecution wrought havoc with the Christian communities, and it is highly probable that much of the correspondence relating to early Christian life has perished.

Hebrews. This Epistle, which in most of the early collections followed the letters of Paul, was in the east attributed to that apostle. But in the western church and in more recent times its non-Pauline character has been fully admitted. It is unfortunate that the Revised Version retains the words which attribute its authorship to Paul through their decision "to leave unchanged the titles given in the Authorized Version." The author is entirely unknown. Conjecture has named Barnabas, Apollos and even Aquilla and Priscilla, but without decision. The epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians, probably in Rome, to point out the relation between the law of Israel and the gospel of Christ. The date was probably somewhere near 80 A. D.

1 Peter. The close resemblance of this epistle in tone and style to the writings of Paul has led some scholars to regard it as the work of a disciple of Paul. But this need not prevent the acceptance of the book as the work of Peter, considering that he may well have been strongly influenced by the work of Paul. The letter was written by Silvanus, or Silas, the former friend and companion of Paul (5:12, cf. Acts 15:40, 1 Thess. 1:1), which may account for any difficulties which seem to stand in the way of its recognition as fully Petrine in character. It seems to have been written from Rome (the "Babylon" of 5:13 is unquestionably a cryptogram for "Rome") about the close of Peter's life (about 65 A. D.) if it is from the hand of the Apostle himself, or 75-85 A. D. if it contains Silvanus' record of Peter's instructions. Its purpose is to strengthen the hearts of believers in a time of persecution.

James. That the author of this brief document was James, the brother of the Lord, has been the tradition of the church for centuries. The importance of this leader of the Jerusalem leader church is noted in several passages (1 Cor. 15:7, Acts 15:13, Gal. 1:19, 2:9-12, Acts 21:18, etc.). The tone of the letter is advisory and practical. It emphasizes the necessity for a good life, which must be the expression of Christian faith. The date has been placed as early as 52 A. D. But there is a tendency at present to regard it as later, perhaps 85 A. D. It was addressed primarily to Jewish Christians ("the twelve tribes of the dispersed Jews"), but its counsels are universal.

Jude. Beyond the tradition that this book was the work of Judas, the brother of James and of the Lord (Matt. 13:55, Mk. 6:3), no conjecture can be made as to its authorship or date. Its references, to the writings of the apostles and to the apocryphal literature (vs. 9, 14, 15) would indicate a somewhat later date, perhaps 85-90 A. D. Its warnings are directed against the danger of following the selfish, sensual and erroneous teachings of false leaders.

2. Peter. Closely following the pattern of Jude, and in its central section practically repeating its words, the book of 2 Peter adds many new and attractive features to the messages already given. That it aims at recognition as the work of the Apostle whose name it bears is shown in 3:2. Of the large amount of later writing, claiming to be the work of the Apostle Peter ("Gospel of Peter," "Apocalypse of Peter," etc.), this work alone seems to have found admission to the New Testament canon. But its opening chapter alone would make it worthy of such honor. Its date may be placed somewhere in the first part of the second century A. D.

1 John. The clear resemblance of style and content between the Gospel of John and the three epistles that bear the name of this apostle have left little doubt that all are from the same source. The First Epistle is a homily of meditation, addressed apparently to the churches of Asia, which were in danger of being led away by false teachings regarding the reality of Christ's incarnation, and by tendencies toward a false sense of wisdom and inattention to the simple moralities of the Christian life. The tradition which assigns these epistles to the last decade of the first century accords best with the facts.

2. John. A brief epistle to some church ("the elect-lady") in Asia Minor, warning against false teachers, and enjoying the commandment of love.

3. John. An epistle to a fellow-worker, Gaius by name, who is commended for his labors, and censuring a certain Diotrephes for his opposition.

Revelation. The book which stands last in our arrangement of the New Testament is an apocalypse, or revelation, of Christian mysteries which only the followers of Jesus are supposed to understand. Jewish writings of this character were very numerous from the times of the Book of Daniel and the Book of Enoch, 165 B. C. to the close of the Jewish state and the end of the first Christian century. They were written in that pictorial and lurid style which employed the figures of beasts, monsters and physical convulsions to represent political and religious events. The purpose of this book is "the revelation of Jesus Christ," in his real power as a ruler of the world, a representation greatly cheering to the persecuted saints in the reigns of Nero and Domition. The great events kept constantly in view in the figurative language of the book are the Neronian persecution of Christians at Rome in 64, 65 A. D., and the overthrow of the Jewish state by the destruction of Jerusalem in 69, 70 A. D. The purpose of the work was to encourage the saints in the midst of their bitter sufferings with the promise of certain overthrow of the wicked world-power of Rome and the triumphant reign of Christ which these terrible events were ushering in. The radical difference between the style and spirit of this book and the Gospel and Epistles which bear the name of John has been accounted for by the view that it was the work of the period 65-70 A. D. ,and thus the first of the Johannie writings. Others place it at the end of the century, and attribute it to "John the Presbyter" or some other writer of the age.

"TO MAKE THE DAY GO EASY."

By Anna Burnham Bryant.

We looked up as the door opened shyly and the Big Boy entered.

"Don't go!" he said, as we started to move aside a little. "I just stopped to look in and speak to mother as I went by the door. It helps to make the day go easy."

A word, a kiss, a loving look, "to make the day go easy!" Who has not asked or longed for it? There are people whose cordial greeting in the morning is a benediction for the day; brave souls whose words in passing is like a strong and helpful handclasp in its inspiring friendliness. Who would not go out of one's way to meet them of a morning?

We are a needy folk. We go about the streets with set, grim, hungry faces, often not telling our trouble, not even wishing any one to guess it. Yet, all the while, we wish some word would come—"to make the day go easy."

The Sunday School--Reunited*

H. L. Willett

We owe much to the Fourth Gospel for its naratives of Christ's life, which are omitted by the Synoptists. Among these there are none more informing than the two interviews with the disciples in the upper room . It may have been the same place in which the Passover supper was eaten. It may have been the room in which the Pentecostal fervor came upon them. In any event, it was a notable spot in their history.

In spite of the testimony of the morning, and the witness of the two of their number who had been met by Jesus on the Emmaes road, it was hard to believe that he was alive again. Far from the ability to frame a resurrection legend with which to deceive the world, these men were hardly able to believe the truth to which several of their number had become witnesses. They were still timid and persistent. There is no indication that the authorities had any purpose to arrest any of them. The Sanhedrin was quite satisfied to have compassed Jesus' death. Nothing more was to be feared from the heresy which had threatened to lead the nation astray. Yet the disciples were terrified at the mere thought of such a danger, and had shut and locked themselves in seclusion for fear of what might happen.

The Signs.

In such a moment Jesus made himself known to them. At first they hardly knew him. Upon all his post-resurrection appearances there seems to have been a hand of mystery laid. It was only when "he made himself known to them" by familiar word or sign that they knew him. It was the same in this case. First he spoke, as he had done to Mary at the tomb. His familiar voice was enough to bring them certainly. Then "he showed them his hands and his side." Was this the same body he had worn in the flesh? There would seem no doubt left if the wound prints were in the hands and side. Yet St. Francis bore such wounds, by long meditation on the sufferings of the Lord. There are greater wonders in heaven and earth than we can explain, and the life and actions of the Master after his three-days' stay in the sepulchre of Joseph are among them. But by signs like these, his voice and his wounds, he convinced them. "Then were the disciples glad when they recognized the Lord." It is ever so. His voice and his wounds are the proofs of his reality. "My sheep hear my voice," "Behold my hands and my side."

"Hath he marks to lead me to him
If he by my Guide?"
"In his hands and feet are wound-prints,
And his side!"

*International Sunday school lesson for June, 1908. Jesus appears to the apostles, John 20:19-31. Golden text, "Thomas answered and said unto him, my Lord and my God," John 20:28. Memory verses 19:20.

The Commission.

Next came the commission. In each of the four Gospels and in the Book of Acts the great commission of Jesus is recorded. It is not given by any two in the same words, which shows how little either Jesus or the disciples set store by verbal accuracy. Matthew's version emphasizes the triple name. Mark records the dangers of disbelief. Luke bids them tarry in Jerusalem till the signal should be given. John likens the commission of Christ to the disciples to that of the Father given to Christ. The Acts speaks of the widening circles of apostolic preaching. But in all the five versions the central thought is preserved. They were "to go out and preach everywhere that men should repent." It was to be a world-wide evangel.

To make more impressive Jesus' authority, and the endurement of power which they were to receive, he breathed upon them, and bade them receive the Holy Spirit. By this significant figure of action Jesus wished them to understand that only as they caught his spirit, gained his point of view, and were filled with his passion, could they do his work. They were to go forth as his representatives. It was theirs to announce in his name the terms on which the pardon of sin could be secured. Not that they had any authority to perform any act of absolution. "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" And not even God can forgive sins unless the sinner, with penitence and prayer, accepts the divine assistance in regaining character. Pardon is not a legal act which sets a man free from the penalties of sin. It is rather the condition of Christ-likeness which roots sin out of life by the grace of God. The apostles were not ecclesiastics, with powers to legislate, to absolve, to command. Much less could they convey to any successors in a hierarchy any such powers. They were "witnesses" for Christ, that, and nothing more, and their words have just the authority which their nearness to Christ and their single-minded devotion to his will gave them.

Thomas.

The sort of men who made up the company of disciples is admirably illustrated in the case of Thomas. He was a raw, untrained, matter-of-fact sort of man. Neither the death of Christ nor the Day of Pentecost changed this. It is the Fourth Gospel that gives Thomas his real character among the disciples of Jesus. He had boldly advised the rest to go up to Jerusalem and die with the Lord, when he told them of his danger. When Jesus spoke of his departure from them, Thomas, the man of fact, with little imagination, but a great wish to find reality, said, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; how can we know the way?" So now once more he appears as the one to insist on plain, ocular proofs that the Master is alive again. He would not believe the good news. He was no "doubter" in the sense that he set himself against evidence. The "doubter" does not want evidence. He wants to be free to disbelieve; not so Thomas. He was eager to find the truth. The Gospel asks no better type of mind than this, so far as its proofs are concerned. It only asks the attention which men of the Thomas type are so ready to give, and it is abundantly able to make good its claims.

The Confession.

But do you suppose that Thomas actally put Jesus to the test? Can you imagine him, on that second Sunday evening, walking up with cool and calculating accuracy to examine the wounds of the Lord? Rather, in an agony of joy and reverence must he have flung himself at Jesus' feet, crying, "My Lord and my God." Jesus knew that all could not see as Thomas did, and he prized the mind that occupied higher proofs than the physical. Yet the men of the Thomas sort are a great host to-day. They have not much of an eye for the unseen. They are not gifted with religious emotion. But all at least can discern the wound-prints in the body of the Son of Man, and by that evidence win the life which is not faithless but believing.

Many other signs! Yes, truly, for our Gospels are brief, and the life of Christ was crowded with works of good. Yet these few we have, and they are enough. The life of the Lord has never yet been written, and it never will be save in the great book of the World Redeemed, where every transformed life is a page, and every century of Christian triumph a chapter. In comparison with that weighty volume how few and brief are these pages of the Gospels. Yet they are enough, for they "are written that we may believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life in his name."

Prayer is more than a kneeling and asking something from God—much more. What we need is to get into the presence of God. We want the hallowing touch of God's own hand and the light of His countenance. Tarrying in His presence, we must have the breath of God breathed into us again, renewing the life which He created at the first.—Mark Guy Pearse.

The Prayer Meeting--Willing to be Bound

Willing to Be Bound.

Topic, June 10: Acts 21:8-14; Phil. 3:4-14.

Who is this man that announces so firmly his readiness to be bound? What does he expect to accomplish by his bondage? What are his motives? These questions being answered, the benefit of his example will accrue to us by way of warning or incitement to the emulation of his virtues. Fools and fanatics have been subjected to humiliation and indignity, and have gloried in their disgrace and suffering. Prophets of God have been stoned and killed by the men whom they were sent to benefit. Where does Paul belong?

A Free Man.

Paul was free-born. The spirit of a free man was his by right of inheritance. He jealously guarded his right to think and act for himself. The breath of tyranny stirred his soul to wrath. His Roman citizenship and his Jewish birth admonished him not to be brought into bondage to any man or institution. Had he been born a slave, his resentment might not have been kindled at the thought of the treatment awaiting him at the hands of his countrymen, for its outrageous character could not have been understood by one of slavish spirit. They who have rights and dare maintain them feel the thrill of noble resolve and utter abandon to high ideals when they read that Paul counted not his life dear unto himself that he might fully accomplish the work of a man.

"For the Name of the Lord Jesus."

We have said that Paul was a free man. He makes this claim for himself. He also speaks of himself as a slave. He was free because he was a slave. In Jesus he found all that he aspired to be. And not only so, he received from Jesus the assistance he needed for the realization of his ideals. Such enslavement as he accepted is the truest freedom. There is no room in a life bound for Christ for cherishing any but the purest sentiments. Abstract right has no meaning for the disciple of Christ. He sees men and their needs, and he comes to a knowledge of duty. He learns of God and the solemn obligations arising out of man's relation to God are impressed upon him. He cannot be an individualist, for what he does is done for the name of the Lord Jesus.

Ministering Unto the Saints.

Sectarianism showed itself early in the history of the church. There were among the disciples of the first generation some who insisted on terms of salvation which the Lord had not commanded. They were Jews and bitter enemies of Paul, whom they denounced as a traitor to the faith of the fathers because he taught that men were saved by faith and not by works of law. There was danger of serious division in the church. Paul was going to Jerusalem with alms from the Gentiles for the poor disciples in Jerusalem that he might not only relieve the distressed, but also promote unity among brethren by exhibiting the fruits of the spirit in the hearts of Gentiles. He knew there was danger in the city. The unbelieving Jews were greatly incensed against him, and sought a favorable opportunity to murder him. Under ordinary circumstances he would not have put his life in jeopardy. He was daring, but not reckless. But when the peace and unity of the church required his presence in Jerusalem, he was ready for whatever might befall.

Christian Endeavor--True Penitence

Topic for June 7. Psalm 51

Repentance cannot undo the sin of which we repent. David had procured Uriah's death. His repentance for what he had done did not restore Uriah to life. Matthew tells us that Judas repented of his betrayal of Jesus, but his repentance did not secure Jesus' release, or save the innocent One whom he had betrayed. And our repentance cannot undo the effects of sin—it cannot atone for the guilt of it. Our sorrow that we did wrong cannot reach back to the wrong and absolve the evil of it, and then follow it along its track of influence upon our own character, which it has alienated from God, and overcome that separation and bring us back to God in right relations again. Penitence can prepare the way for God to do all that can be done to undo and atone for sin, but only God can undo and atone, and God can act only through truly repentant souls. What is true penitence?

True penitence is sorrow for our sins. It is real sorrow. It does not look for excuses, for palliation, for defects or faults in those against whom we sinned, or for sins of theirs which we make the justification of ours. It does not say, "Others have done as bad. It does not console itself, "Oh, well, it is inevitable that such things should happen, but time will make me feel all right. I shall forget the sting and shame of it." It does not say, "Oh, God has made us so, and he will not be severe." It sorrows with a sincere and honest sorrow, and knows that it deserves nothing but judgment.

True penitence is humility. It does not say, "Once doesn't matter, and was perhaps necessary to put me on my guard. Now that I am experienced, I shall not fall again; I have learned how to stand firmly now." Oh, no, it knows that it will fall again in the same way, or in some new way, just as disastrously, unless there is help from above and it distrusts itself and leans on God, and says, "Lord, unless thou hold me, I shall not stand."—R. E. Speer.

Incidents and Illustrations.

The portrait of Dante, painted upon the walls of the Bargello, at Florence, for many years was supposed to have utterly perished. But an artist, determined to find it again, went into the palace where tradition said it had been painted. The room was then a storehouse for lumber and straw, the walls covered with dirty whitewash. He cleansed the whitewash from the wall, and outlines and colors began to reappear, until at last the face of the poet was revealed. Christ came to restore the defaced, but not effaced, image of God in man.—Missionary Review.

A man came to an evangelist desiring relief from a guilty conscience. He related an awful story of sin and said, "Sir, I want God's pardon." The evangelist told him that he must make an honest attempt to undo the past. "But," said the man, "that will mean prison, and it may mean prison for life." The evangelist replied, "It will do no good to talk about pardon and peace as long as there is wrong to be righted." And true penitence would not have it otherwise.

DR. TALKS OF FOOD.

President of Board of Health.

"What shall I eat?" is the daily inquiry the physician is met with. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment a large percentage of disease is caused by poorly selected and improperly prepared food. My personal experience with the fully-cooked food, known as Grape-Nuts, enables me to speak freely of its merits.

"From overwork, I suffered several years with malnutrition, palpitation of the heart, and loss of sleep. Last summer I was led to experiment personally with the new food, which I used in conjunction with good rich cow's milk. In a short time after I commenced its use, the disagreeable symptoms disappeared, my heart's action became steady and normal, the functions of the stomach were properly carried out, and I again slept as soundly and as well as in my youth.

"I look upon Grape-Nuts as a perfect food, and no one can gainsay but that it has a most prominent place in a rational, scientific system of feeding. Any one who uses this food will soon be convinced of the soundness of the principle upon which it is manufactured, and may thereby know the facts as to its true worth." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

stantly. Great numbers are being added also in India. The gains are much more rapid in heathen lands than at home in proportion to our membership at home and abroad. A great and better day is surely dawning.

June 9-11 is the date of the conventnion for the Seventh District of Illinois. Large delegations are expected by the church in Salem where the meeting will be held.

While the Easter offering has run somewhat ahead of last year, it has not kept pace with the growing needs. Many Bible Schools have seemingly turned a deaf ear to the orphans' cry. How can these schools look up and invoke the blessing of our Lord when they have said to his suffering little ones, "Be ye warmed and be ye filled"? Let all of our Bible schools have fellowship with our Master in this beautiful ministry and then they may confidently expect His blessing. He that hath pity on the Lord lendeth to the poor.

BETHANY CHURCH, LINCOLN, NEB.

The church here has been greatly uplifted recently by the visit of Brother Warren, our Centennial Secretary, and Dr. and Mrs. Dye, of Belengi, Africa. Brother Warren was with us on the first Sunday in May, and gave his great address on "Tithing." At the conclusion of the discourse, more than one hundred signed their names either as being already tithers or as willing to be tithers in the future. This gives us a hundred members and more who are tithing their incomes for the Master's work. Brother Warren has a great message, and any church can count itself fortunate that enjoys a visit from him.

Dr. and Mrs. Dye have just gone away from us, and they have left behind them a benediction which can neither be described nor imagined. They both addressed our people on more than one occasion. They have a wonderful story to tell, and it is one that quickens the spiritual life in a marked degree. We have a half dozen more student volunteers as a result of their visit with us. Mrs. Dye is the representative of the University church on the foreign field, and we are glad to have such a woman as Mrs. Dye representing this institution and church in the land of Africa.

We are soon to begin work on the new church building. It is to be of the Greek Temple style of architecture, built of brick with press brick finish, and is to have a seating capacity of fifteen hundred, exclusive of the Sunday School Department which will be complete in equipment and accommodate an audience of one thousand or more.

The work of Cotner University this year is beyond that of any other year of its history, and great things are yet ahead. Wonderful consecration and sacrifice are to be found on every hand. Victory is ours.

ILLINOIS FIRST DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The most successful convention of the Disciples ever held in northern Illinois closed at Freeport on Thursday evening of this week.

The attendance was large and the delegates enthusiastic. The treasury reported a comfortable balance, and the year's work reported by the Secretary a very satisfactory one. The program was made interesting through the presence of such men as State President H. L. Willett, Parker Stockdale, J. Fred Jones, C. G. Kindred, H. H. Peters and others. Freeport took good care of the convention through the co-operation and help of our religious neighbors. The church here is only a mission, having been organized less than two years ago. It has been supported in the past by the District largely, but the cheering news was brought us by Bro. Jones, State Secretary, that the First church at Bloomington has made us its Living Link. This gives us much courage and hope. The opportunity to build up a strong church here in this city of 20,000 is one of the greatest openings in the country. The door is open through the influence largely of the great sanitarium here, at the head of which is Dr. J. T. White, a Disciple of old Missouri stock, whose dream of years has been to build up a great institution on the lines of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. The great hosts of friends of the institution among the very best people of the city give us a prestige and a hearing in our church work that we could not otherwise have at the start. The District Convention voted to continue support to this place, which in addition to the Bloomington help will make it possible for us to plan and carry forward a number of things for the increase of the church.

The officers for the coming year were elected as follows: President, J. M. Ross, Walnut; Vice-President, Judge H. M. Trimble, Princeton; Secretary, D. F. Seyster, Lanark. Board members, George A. Potter, Erie; Daniel Wolf, Polo; David Wolf, Lanark; Bible School Superintendent, Mamie Hoover, Sterling; C. E. Superintendent, Guy L. Zerby, Tampico.

Everything was harmonious from start to finish in the convention, and the work of the new year is entered with great hopefulness.

A CHEERFUL LETTER FROM LU CHEO FU, CHINA

We are glad to report four more baptisms here. Two of them are young men, medical students. This makes nine conversions recently.

Dr. Butchart has a staff of two graduate assistants and seven students, all of whom are Christians except one, and he is just a recent addition. He is a very promising young man, and will probably believe the Gospel when he has heard more of it.

The medical work this year has surpassed all former records. In eleven months there have been 28,600 treatments and 1,035 out-visits. When the number for April is added to this, there will be over 30,000. Think of 315 in one day! Two days this spring the number went over 300. The daily average for the month of March was 177.

The hospital is crowded with patients, and many are turned away because there is no place for them. Those who are accommodated are sent away as soon as possible to make room for others. The gate-house has been turned into a ward, and four men are sleeping there. The hospital needs to be enlarged and the force increased to meet present and future needs.

The hospital brings many callers to our home. The high-class ladies are not will-

FLY TO PIECES.
The Effect of Coffee on Highly Organized People.

"I have been a coffee user for years, and about two years ago got into a very serious condition of dyspepsia and indigestion. It seemed to me I would fly to pieces. I was so nervous that at the least noise I was distressed, and many times could not straighten myself up because of the pain.

"My physician told me I must not eat any heavy or strong food and ordered a diet, giving me some medicine. I followed directions carefully, but kept on using coffee and did not get any better. Last winter my husband, who was away on business, had Postum Food Coffee served to him in the family where he boarded.

"He liked it so well that when he came home he brought some with him. We began using it and found it most excellent. While I drank it my stomach never bothered me in the least, and I got over my nervous troubles. When the Postum was all gone we returned to coffe, then my stomach began to hurt me as before and the nervous conditions came on again.

"That showed me exactly what was the cause of the whole trouble, so I quit drinking coffee altogether and kept on using Postum. The old troubles left again and I never had any trouble since." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

AN ENCOURAGING RESPONSE TO THE ORPHAN'S CRY.

The following Bible schools have entered our family of Life Lines through the Easter offering:

Marshall, Mo., Farmington, Mo., Columbus, Ind., Abingdon, Ill.

These, by contributing one hundred dollars per year, furnish the entire support of a child or aged dependent Disciple. The old Life Lines all remain, and so the number of those who bear one another's burdens in fulfillment of the law of Christ continues to grow.

The need is great. Many of our Lord's suffering little ones stand knocking for admission to the sheltering protection of Christian love. The Master's appeal through them has remained unanswered because of the lack of funds.

Every Bible school in the brotherhood should have fellowship in this holy ministry. To neglect the cry of the orphan is surely to neglect Christ, no matter what else may be done. It is not too late. Let at least one service of the year and one offering be given in pity for the poor.

A SECOND CHANCE

Children's Day, June 7, affords a second chance to the members and churches that are not satisfied with the offerings they made in March. There ought to be about two thousand five hundred of these churches, and this divine dissatisfaction ought to be stirring in the hearts of ten thousands of Disciples. Remember these two offerings must maintain the work for a whole year. Remember this is the year before the Centennial. Fifty new missionaries are to be sent out. Consider also that your total missionary offerings are such a small part of your aggregate expenses for the year that to plead the financial depression for reducing or failing to increase them would be actually trifling with a sacred matter.

But there are two or three thousand other churches and some more hundreds of thousands of Disciples that gave nothing at all in March. They missed the first missionary chance of the year entirely. Let them seize the second chance that Children's Day offers. On the same day make a separte offering from the church, that both church and Bible school may be represented in the reports of the year. The same agitation, the same house-to-house canvass, and the same interest will produce both offerings. Get up a friendly rivalry among the classes of the school, and between the Bible school and the church. Let us have no six-foot men hiding behind kindergarten children when the Lord's supreme command is being proclaimed. Thank God for the second chance, and do your duty.

RECORD-BREAKING OFFERING.

The First Church of Christ, Birmingham, Ala., A. R. Hoore, minister, made its offering for home missions Sunday, May 17. W. J. Wright, corresponding secretary, was present and spoke on, "The Work of American Evangelization." There was a large and enthusiastic congregation present. The offering in cash and pledges amounted to $1,300. This, so far as we know, breaks the record for home missionary offerings by ou rchurches. It is a remarkable offering in different ways. First, it is more than $3 per member for the entire church. Second, it was made at a most inopportune time. Birmingham is dependent on one great interest, steel manufacturing. Beginning with the financial depression last autumn, the mines, blast furnaces and steel plants have been shut down, and at the time of this offering but twenty-five per cent of them were in operation. For months there have been thousands of idle men in the city. Still further, the price of pig iron, which is the base of Birmingham's prosperity, is but $11.50 per ton now, as against $18.50 one year ago.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now Be Tested in Your Own Home

Deaf or partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone on payment of a small deposit. This is unusually important news for the deaf, for by this plan the final selection of the one completely satisfactory hearing aid is made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

Mrs. C. Lidecka, 238 12th Ave., Maywood, Ill., wears an Electrophone less conspicuous than eyeglasses.

This new invention U. S. Patents Nos. 858,986 and 855,458, renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing, and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A MILLIONAIRE'S OPINION

STOLZ ELECTROPHONE CO., Chicago.—I am pleased to say that the Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size and great in hearing qualities makes it PREFERABLE TO ANY. I can recommend it to all persons who have defective hearing.—M. W. HOYT, Wholesale Grocer, Michigan Avenue and River Street, Chicago.

Write or call at our Chicago office for particulars of our personal test on deposit offer and list of prominent endorsers who will answer inquiries. Physicians cordially invited to investigate. Address or call (call if you can.)

The congregation is not a wealthy one, but to the contary is comparatively poor. Young men and women who work hard for small wages gave with amazing liberality in this home missionary offering. The secret of it all is a church well taught and trained by a man who believes the dictum of our Master, "It is more blessed to give than receive." The congregation is given every possible opportunity of hearing what is being done in the mission fields. They respond because they have knowledge and knowledge has quickened interest, and interest has developed into enthusiasm.

Here is an example worthy of imitation by hundreds of our congregations. Not a few of our churches are able to give dollars where the Birmingham church is able to give dimes. May this splendid example either shame of inspire them into doing their whole duty in America's evangelization.

A vast number of our churches have not sent their offerings for home missions. Our need is imperative. Take the offering and forward it promptly to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

THE OFFERING FOR HOME MISSIONS

Thus far during May one hundred and forty-five churches which sent nothing last year have sent offerings. Larger offerings than were sent last year have come to us one hundred and sixteen churches. On the while twelve congregations have sent exactfrom one hundred and sixteen churches, ly the same amount as last year. On the other hand one hundred and thirty-eight churches have sent smaller contributions than last year.

The large churches have hardly commenced to remit. Messages have come from them telling that they are holding ing them for further offerings from members. When these big offerings begin to come we hope that our receipts will sweep far in excess of last year. At present the whole tendency is to fall behind.

If you have not taken the offering, do it at once, and remit promptly to the American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

THOMAS McBRIDE MORGAN.

Elder Thomas McBride Morgan, who for more than forty years was a faithful minister of the Word, passed away Sunday, May 10. Brother Morgan was born May 9, 1842, in Davis county, Missouri. He was married to Rachel Barnes in the State of Kansas in 1863. It was the next year after his marriage that he began in the same state to declare the unsearchable riches, and he has been actively engaged in the ministry nearly ever since. In 1875 he moved to Coos county, Oregon, and since that time has preached in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and California. Among the churches which he organized are those at Dayton, Eden Valley, Washington, and Junction City, Ore. He has ministered to the churches at Amity, Roseberg, Coakwell City, Bethel, Pleasant Hill and Cottage Grove, Oregon; Moscow, Idaho; Pomeroy and Covello, Wash.: Coralitos and Paso Robles, Cal. His last work was at Paso Robles, Cal. For several years he has considered Santa Cruz., Cal., his home. He had just closed a splendid work at Paso Robles, and had been home but a few days when he suddenly died.

His was a very fruitful ministry, and it was a great pleasure to hear his stories of the pioneer days. He has many friends in the five states where he has preached who will mourn his departure. Brother Morgan was very active in every good cause, especially the temperance movement.

He is survived by the faithful wife who shared his sorrows and joys. Brother leaves seven sons, one of whom is Lloyd Morgan, a student at Eugene Divinity School.

The funeral service was conducted by the writer on the 13th at Santa Cruz.

HOW EVEN THE DEAF ARE MADE TO HEAR PERFECTLY IN THE MODERN CHURCHES.

The final perfectment of the Stolz Church Electrophone makes it possible nowadays to so equip a church that its deaf members can hear the service perfectly in any part of the auditorium. The apparatus consists of a sound transmitter which is placed near or on the pulpit and connected with tiny sound receivers in the pews of the deaf members by means of invisible transmission wires.

Exhaustive tests have proved the device to be all that is claimed for it. It is practically invisible, able to serve any number of deaf people in every and any part of the building, has great power in sound transmission, enabling even the deafest person to hear the entire service with great clearness, is easily installed, does not mar the edifice in any way, is always in order, needs no supervision, and finally is so reasonable in cost that any church or the members thereof can afford it. We are willing to make a free trial installation, under certain conditions, in any church in the country, and pastors, church officers, and others interested are invited to write for full particulars. Stolz Church Electrophone Co., 906 Stewart Building, Chicago.

STANFORD.

Mrs. Margaret Stanford—a long time Disciple—mother of Elder Orin Stanford, Englewood (Chicago) church, passed away March 23 in Youngstown, O., her native state, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. John W. Williams, at the age of 72. Removing to Chicago about 1890, after a residence of some 15 years, she returned east, where, suffering from lung trouble, she gradually failed, being for many months unable to leave her room. The end was peaceful. She died in the Lord.

THE TRANSFORMATION.

By L. M. MONTGOMERY.

Upon the marsh mud, dark and foul,
A golden sunbeam softly fell,
And from the noisome depths arose
A lily miracle.

Upon a dark, bemired life
A gleam of human love was flung,
And lo, from that ungenial soil,
A noble deed upsprung.

There is a wonderful propulsive power in the presence of the Master to any who really know the need of the world.

Reds and Blues Contest Buttons

REDS AND BLUES Contest plans have proved wonderfully successful in Y. M. C. A. work and are proving more so in Sunday school work. By making use of our Reds and Blues plans you can easily double your school membership in a month or six weeks. You can break up irregular attendance in a very short time. You can raise large sums of money for your needs. You can secure church attendance, bringing of lesson helps, bringing of collection, coming on time.

The Reds and Blues plans please because they set everybody at work heartily and enthusiastically and because each leaves the school in a healthy condition when the contest is ended.

Each Reds and Blues plan requires dividing the school into two sections—Reds and Blues and appointing captains, one or more, for each side, a social or other treat to be given at the close of the contest, when those on the winning side receive ice-cream and cake, and the losers crackers and cheese, or some other attraction to celebrate the close of the contest and the victory. Treat is to be paid for by the school. Complete instructions sent with each order.

Price, in lots of 10 or more (sent assorted, one-half each color), 1½c each, postpaid; 50 or more, 1c each, postpaid.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net, postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

MAGAZINE NOTES.

The June Century contains an article by Mrs. Isaac L. Rice on "Our Barbarous Fourth."

"The Abbotsholme" is the English school where Dr. Cecil Reddie is making practical protest "against the luxuriousness of British education, against the abandonment of the country for the artificial life of the city, against the kid-gloved aristocracy which fails to recognize the nobility of labor," aiming "through education to turn back the people to the neglected soil—in fact, to recolonize England through the medium of a class of landlords educated to totally different ideals." An account of a visit to this unique school, showing keen observation of its life and work, has been written for the June Century by Preston W. Search, author of "An Ideal School."

There are also several articles on political personages.

The June Metropolitan—Every one is interested just now in the two big national conventions to be held in Chicago and Denver. It is prophesied that the two conventions will be the most sensational since 1860. The Metropolitan Magazine publishes an article on "The National Conventions and the Country," by Charles Wadsworth Camp. Another important article in this number is "What Christian Science Claims," by the Rev. Irving C. Tomlinson, M. A., Secretary to Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy. Under the title of "Jefferson Davis at West Point," Prof. Walter L. Fleming, of the Louisiana State University, tells for the first time the fascinating story of the youth of the President of the Confederacy, and throws interesting sidelights on the beginnings of West Point.

"The Government of England," by Professor A. Lawrence Lowell, is announced for publication by The Macmillan Company, on May 27. This is the great work in which professor Lowell has essayed to give a complete description of the present political system of Great Britain.

FIRST ADDITION SOLD OUT.

The first edition of "Mr. Crewe's Career" (Macmillan, N. Y.), possibly the largest first edition of a novel ever prepared, is entirely exhausted, and a large second edition is now in press.

A NATIONAL MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION.

The officers of all the ministerial associations, state district and city are respectfully urged to appoint delegates to a conference of such representatives to be held in New Orleans in connection with the National Convention in October.

The committee appointed in Bloomington by a conference of the ministers in attendance there, will make a unanimous report in favor of organizing an American Christian Ministerial Association, and will submit plan for such an organization.

Several state and district associations have already taken favorable action, and it is earnestly desired that all shall do so. There ought to be as much solidarity and brotherliness in our ministry as there is among coal miners and railroad conductors.

THE ARGONAUTS.

The Argo stood in the harbor of Iolcus-by-the-Sea. On its benches sat the fifty rowers; the pride of Minian chivalry. There was Hercules with the club and lion-skin. There were Castor and Pollox, the twin sons of the magic swan. There were Zetas and Calais, sons of the north wind. Pelias was there, the father of Achilles and the husband of silver-footed Thetis, the goddess of the sea. Talemon and Oelius were there, the fathers of the two Ajaxes who were yet to fight upon the ringing plains of windy Troy. There were Argus, the famed ship-builder, Orpheus, sad with memory of his lost Eurydice, and young Jason, the leader of the company, who had pledged himself, with the help of these valiant comrades, to bring back to his land the far-famed Golden Fleece that hung in the wood of the war god Mars, guarded by a fire-breathing dragon.

The sea beach was thronged with the people of Iolcus and Greece. The parents, companions and friends of the Argonauts were there to watch with breathless interest the launching of the vessel. "Never was there so fair and promising a group of heroes," was the burden of thought and speech. When at last the preparations were complete, the sacred bough of Dodona was placed at the bow, and at a signal, though the strength of fifty oars had not sufficed to start the vessel, a single chord upon the harp of Orpheus caused the Argo to tremble as if gathering itself, and then it leaped into the embracing waves, and the great voyage had begun.

Along the coast of Thessaly they went, past Olympus, Athos and Samothrace. They passed the isle of Sirens, where only the music of Orpheus saved them from the deadly lure. They traversed the Hellespont, and entered the sea beyond the region of storms, the chilly fogs and ice. They escaped the wandering blue rocks, the terror of mariners. They passed the forge-fires of the giants and the regions of the dead, and at last they saw the distant snow peaks of the Caucasus. Under their crests they anchored at Cholcus, tamed the brazen bulls, sowed the dragon's teeth, with Medea's help overcame the deadly guardian of the enchanted forest, and at last returned bringing home the Golden Fleece.

This is the season of the year in which the new Argonauts set sail. For what are these "commencement" days but times when the Argo starts out afresh? Every generation of young lives sets out to find and bring the Golden Fleece. And no greater joy, pride, anxiety and love could have filled the hearts of the company assembled in the harbor of Iolcus, in the Greek legend, than thrill the souls of those who look on at these high celebrations in honor of life's first completions. For education comes nearer being a universal passion of our poeple than anything else we know. Politics rouses us for a time, and there are recurring festivals of patriotism to which the entire nation responds. But education is the unceasing concern of every grade of popular intelligence. Even religion, the highest of all human interests, does not secure for itself the continuity of attention which is centered upon education.

There is something very inspiring in this vision of an army of youth passing in review at the end of the school experience. It is enough to bring back the sense of vivacity and hope to the most world-weary and depressed pessimist. To be sure these young and fair-faced Argonauts will pass through many perils on the voyage. Some of them will listen to the fatal siren song, some of them will loiter in lotus lands and lose the mighty chance, some of them will go down in the struggle, overborne by the giants of misfortune, unwisdom or inefficiency. But they do not know it yet, and in that merciful oblivion in which the future is veiled, lies the opportunity that they may escape the peril and come back with the prize.

No people on earth give so much thought to popular education as the Americans. Not even Germany, with its magnificent university system, has taken such thought for the lower grades of instruction as has our own land. The public school is the possession of no class, but of all the people. The graduating class of the high school presents the inspiring picture of the sons and daughters of the rich and poor, the capitalist and the artisan, side by side, with the highest honors quite as likely to go to one as the other.

The new education is inspired by religion, but it is the gift of the state, and therefore for all the people, without sectarian bias or test. It is for the whole of the student, not his intellect alone, but for his body as the instrument of efficiency, his hand as the organ of industrial competence, his mind as the seat of intelligence, his will as the controlling lever of character, his sense of the beautiful as the needed enrichment of life, and his spiritual nature as the organ of reverence, holiness and the fear of God. Not all of these values are imparted to education in our day, but they are ideals which the leaders of educational theory are insisting upon with ever-increasing emphasis.

Two things are emerging as matters for reflection on the part of all interested in popular education. The first is that the youth of our age is entitled to the fullest and most competent equipment he can secure. There is still much belated disprisal of "higher education," as if it were a mere accomplishment with which practical people might well dispense. The so-called "self-made man" has been held up as the example for imitation. But the truly "self-made man" is the one who has used every means within his reach for self-improvement. He has not failed to advantage himself by all the help he could secure from college and university when they were at all within his reach. When they were not, he has done the best he could do with less. But the truly self-made man is the last to boast of limited educational equipment. And he is the first to insist that his children shall have the advantages which he has not been able to secure for himself. When even industrial enterprises, like railroads, manufacturing concerns and great mercantile plants are making it the rule to employ only college men for their more responsible positions, it is no time to permit boys and girls to compromise with the ample opportunities they now have for a full and competent education.

The second item is a larger measure of insistence on the true aim of education as a preparation of the individual for the amplest usefulness and the fullest enjoyment of the life he is to live. There is a heresy which is not infrequently met in the thought of people who are interested in having their children properly instructed. They fancy that the true end of education is to add something to the earning capacity of the youth. The desirability of a school and college course as a means of getting on in the world is one of the themes of thought and conversation on the part of ambitious parents and young men. To escape from the ranks of workers and become a millionaire is the aim of this type of mind.

Nothing more foolish or harmful could ever be held up as the object of the educational system of our land. The purpose of training is to make a man more useful as a member of society, more dependable as a neighbor and citizen, more contented and hopeful in his own home and social circle, more a man in all the high values which life bestows. Most of us, by far the most, are never going to be wealthy, and for this we ought to be profoundly grateful. We are going to live very simple, quiet, unobtrusive lives in the places where we are set. Now to make such a life as this beautiful and fruitful, to reveal in it the virtues of personal, domestic, industrial, civic and religious well-being is to reach the highest level of value to society, which is possible to most of us. For such a life a full and competent education prepares. And such a Golden Fleece of noble purpose and true success we may well hope these young men and women of our graduating classes, the true Argonauts of our age, may bring home.

Dost Thou Believe on the Son of God?

Earle Marion Todd

There are two things in our thought about Jesus that must be kept separate—(1) the effect produced on men by his personality, and (2) the interpretation of that effect in terms of the intellect.

As to the former, it is the same in every age. It varies in degree and in color according to the temperament and susceptibility of the disciple, but in kind it is always the same. All true men alike are subdued, inspired, ennobled by the personality of Jesus. All are astonished in his presence. There is a difference only in intensity in the impression made on Nathaniel, on Peter, on Mary of Bethany, on the "woman that was a sinner," on James, the Lord's brother, on Paul, on Polycarp, on Francis of Assisi, on David Livingstone, on Henry Martyn, on the Chinese Christians that perished in the Boxer insurrection—on all the saints and martyrs of the past and of the present. Wherever he is preached and accepted the result is the same. There are no differences here. Renan and Richter Carlyle and John Stuart Mill and Theodore Parker vie with the "orthodox" in their tributes to "Him who, being the holiest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the holy, lifted with his pierced hands empires off their hinges, and turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs the ages."

But when we come to the interpretation of these facts, and seek for their equivalents in terms of the intellect, we find ourselves in a changed environment. Here we are amidst the clashing of variant theologies, the crimination and recriminations, the excommunications and counter excommunications of contending orthodoxies. No two people explain the Person of Jesus alike. Nor can it be otherwise. We may be more nearly in agreement with some than with others, but it is only a relative agreement after all. The little child from a Christian home, and the last convert from cannibalism on the Congo, and the broadly educated and deeply cultured professor in an eastern college, who some time ago became a Christian, may all express their faith by the same formula,—but do they all mean the same by it?

They do not mean the same by it. To say that Jesus is "divine" is but the conventional way of saying that he is unique. It may mean much, or it may mean little, or it may mean nothing: but it has the advantage of making one "orthodox," for orthodoxy is merely a matter of words, not of things. and it is desirable as being conducive to happy relations with other Christians. But it does not indicate unanimity in the understanding or interpretation of the Person of Christ. As a matter of fact, the word "divinity," as applied to Christ, is exactly equivalent to "x" in the algebraic equasion, and the problem of theology for nineteen centuries has been to find the value of "x." But it is not the problem of religion, nor the problem of Christianity; we can work out the problem of religion and of Christianity quite as well without knowing the value of "x."

The "divinity" of Christ is a phrase devised to express the uniqueness of the character of Christ. It is not his miracles that require to be accounted for; nor yet so much his teaching, though it cannot be denied that even here we are in the presence of an unique phenomenon. It is himself that requires to be accounted for. There is a finality about his character that marks him off as unique. In the realm of the moral and spiritual he stands absolutely alone. And so great is the chasm that separates him from the rest of men, so unapproachable is he in the moral grandeur of his truth and love and spiritual strength, that men instinctively feel that he belongs in a category by himself, and so they denominate him "divine," and speak of him as the "Son of God."

Every age has endeavored to fix the meaning of the word "divine," and limit it to some special theory of the Person of Christ. In our own day, some well-meaning evangelicals, recognizing the latitude of meaning to which the term may be accommodated, have proposed to abandon it and to substitute the more definite term, "deity." But here again you have the old equasion, "deity=x," and it is doubtful if the new term will fare better than the old. For a time it will serve as a badge for those that are concerned about orthodoxy, but will later, in its turn, become a term of latitude, and a badge of heterodoxy. And all this for the simple reason that men are men and not sheep; they grow.

Some of our attempts at defining the divinity of Christ are painfully inadequate, and reveal a surprisingly superficial grasp of the problem—as for example, those which refer it to the physical miracle of a virgin-birth. To argue that the moral and spiritual perfections of Jesus were due to the fact that He was born of a virgin is clearly a non sequitur; He is, even in that case, connected with sinful humanity through his mother. Other theories—and these, it is to be feared, are the popular ones—approach perilously near, if indeed they do not actually involve the old docetic heresy, than which no misbelief more fatal to progress, has survied the centuries.* Possibly no satisfactory interpretation of the Person of Christ is possible; certainly no authoritative interpretantio is possible. And for this good reason that all men are not constituted alike, and do not stand on the same intellectual plane. The divinity of Christ has never meant the same to any two ages in the history of Christianity; there is abundant and incontrovertible evidence of this in the New Testament and in Christian history. It did not mean the same the primitive church when the first gospel was written as it did when the Fourth gospel was writeen; it did not mean the same to Paul when he wrote the two epistles to the Thessalonians as it did when he wrote Ephesians and Phillippians and Colossians..

These interpretations are of secondary, not primary, importance. It is not essential to the effective working of Christ in the salvation of men that they should understand the mystery of his being, or even that they should have formed any opinion as to the nature of his unique relation to the Father. This, of course, goes directly against the practice of the church, which has in every age placed the emphasis on intellectual soundness, and made this the supreme test of fellowship; we must interpret the Person of Christ aright, or we are none of his, however profoundly we may be affected by his personality, and however freely we may acknowledge his supremacy. But this was not so in New Testament times. They confessed him as LORD. The Jews confessed him as Christ, which is the same thing. "Son of God" was at first an official designation of the Messiah. Later it came to have a deeper significance as we have used it above; but even then there was no intention to emphasize the value of intellectual soundness, but merely to give clearer emphasis to his Lordship.

Among the New Books

Rheingold, by Wagner. Retold by Oliver Huckel. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.

The author has already published other translations of Wagner's dramas, such as Parsifal, Lohengrin and Tannhauser. They are not mere translations, but a poetic paraphrase told in charming blank verse. The book opens with a foreword, giving the sources of the Nibelinger Ring and the aim of the present translation which is not to follow the music as the English librettos must do, but to present the thought in literary form.

Rose MacLeod, by Alice Brown, Boston, Houghton, Mifflin and Co., pp. 406. $1.50.

Miss Brown has written quite a number of novels, among them the best known probably being "The Mannerings" and "King's End." The present volume has several very interesting characters. Markham MacLeod, the father of Rose, was the chief man of the "Brotherhood," who had immense influence over Peter Grant, the artist, and Electra Fulton, whom he loves, but who is so wrapped up in the "Brotherhood" that she will not give any thought to love. Peter has a brother Osmond, who is a cripple, and has always lived next to nature, and had no contact with people of the world. He falls in love with Rose, and they live and converse in a spirit world, which has nothing in common with everyday life. Finally, however, when each discovers the other's love, they become practical lovers, and all ends happily. Electra goes abroad to work out the plans of the "Brotherhood," and Peter goes back to his painting. A pleasant summer day's reading.

Literature in the Eelementary School, by Porter Lander MacClintock. University of Chicago Press. pp. 350, $1.00.

A list of some of the chapters in this book will give a very good idea of the value of the book. 1, The services we may expect literature to render in the education of children. 2, The kinds of literature and the elements of literature serviceable in the elementary school. 5, The choice of stories. 6, Folk-Tale and Fairy Story. 7, Myth as literature. 8, Hero tales and romances, etc.

The book is the outcome of Mrs. MacClintock's work in the Elementary School of the University of Chicago. She has had wide experience as a teacher and speaker, and this book is the result of her practical work.

She gives a list of books for home reading also and every mother and teacher should possess herself of this very helpful and suggestive book.

King Gobbler, by Abbie N. Smith, Educational Publishing Co., Boston. pp. 178 $1.

This little book is on the same order as Black Beauty of wide fame. King Gobbler tells his experience with the other animals in the barnyard, and also with the children. The book is well illustrated and will be a delight to every child.

The Master Influence, by Thomas McKean. Philadelphia, J. B. Lippincott Co. pp. 308 $1.50.

The heroine of this story, Helen Mainwaring, thinks she is incapable of love, and the working out of her life until she yields to the cry of her lover, "Helen, awake! Come to me," makes interesting reading.

Mr. McKean is a lover of music, and makes several of his characters fine musicians. Although the main part of the story takes place in New York, he gives some charming glimpses of Italian life and scenery.

"FAIR MARGARET" IN DEMAND.

Marion Crawford's new book, "The "Prima Donna," has sent people back to "Fair Margaret," and compelled the printing of a new edition of the earlier book. These two stories are apparently the most popular ones that Mr. Crawford has written since his "Saracinesca" series.

It will be good news to Mr. Crawford's critic and admirer that the third novel of the "Margaret Donne" trilogy is already written, and that it will be published probably before the end of the year, with the title "The Diva's Ruby." (Macmillan, N. Y.)

NEW EDITIONS OF "THE HEART OF A CHILD."

The fourth edition of Frank Danby's "The Heart of a Child," which has just been brought out, is already exhausted, and the fifth edition, now on the press, is to be published on the 30th. (Macmillan, N. Y.)

The Middle-of-the-Road Minister

S. S. Lappin

Two types of mind or tendencies of thought are to be seen in the ministry of the Disciples to-day. They are distinct and extreme—the far swing of a long pendulum between them. If one were to be termed conservative the other might be called liberal. One takes its stand for things tried and true and makes loyalty its chief stock in trade; the other is concerned with what we may call new things —New Theology, New Psychology, New Learning and New Evangelism. The one is too often ready to endorse anything as true if only it be not new, and the other is as often eager to adopt some new thing without first having proved it to be true.

These two zones of thought we loosely term "First Principle" and "Higher Critic." Our designations are not well chosen and not truly significant; they are but nicknames and, though nobody stands sponsor when a nickname is given, a willing public stands ready to make it current, and give it a meaning often widely different from that suggested by the word itself.

Of those we so glibly associate with "First Principles" and the "Old Jerusalem Gospel" there is a goodly percentage who have not the first principles of that gospel in their lives, nor the spirit of it in their attitude toward others, no whit less loyal than they. It is true also that among those we designate as critics the major part have neither the learning nor the caution needful for real critical research. So it is safe that these gratuitous titles we have bestowed upon certain of the brethren indicate, in most cases, at least, an attitude of mind and nothing more. Yet even this is not unimportant, for what can promise more of good or ill or presage with greater certainty what is in a man than the attitude he voluntarily assumes toward vital things?

Any protest against this condition of things will prove futile and foolish. These very extremes are present in every movement of men. They are the natural advance and rear guards of a marching mass and, as such, are an essential part of the body to which they belong. The pioneer who pushes out over hill and plain to subdue the uninviting frontier is a part of civilization; no less also is the staid old farmer who is content with his New England hillside, and both add something important to the material growth of the world. This paper is a protest, not against the condition but against the abuse of it—not against the existence of shrewd and wakeful scouts to precede and follow the camp, but against the prevalent notion that every man must of necessity be a scout.

In my judgment the minister who feels compelled to take a stand and declare himself at every new turn of current discussions is most unfortunately constituted. He is like the fisherman who gets so interested in setting out new lines that he fails to land the fish that take his bait, or the hunter who gets so excited that he keeps ramming loads in his gun and never fires at anything, or the commander of an army who plans his campaign with such detail that he has no time to give battle to the enemy. He will not work to advantage for, since his appeal is partisan, his force of helpers will be circumscribed; he will not be popular, for the best that can come to him is the approval of the few who see as he does on a given question; he will not have a good time, for he will surely get, and often unmerited, many a sound whack from the opposition he has needlessly aroused.

There is no possible advantage to be gained by a minister getting himself rated as uncertain concerning even the smallest portion of the Word he preaches, or even as entertaining peculiar views as to its origin and composition. Nor is he more to be envied who champions the opposite cause and converts his pulpit into a controversial stronghold from which to deliver fusilades in sermonic form. No man need think his opinions so important as to make it needful that he sacrifice himself by handing out pronunciamentos in broadcast fashion. There is an apostolic word of caution for those who sow carelessly. We live at a time when any minister may be called to account for whatever vain and idle word he may have spoken.

Walking with a friend who is regarded as a conservative, not long since, he spoke to me in a low tone of another who was following at a few paces distant. He said, "Say, now, don't look back at once when I speak to you, but do you know that this man behind us has got to be a rabid higher critic?" Presently I stole a casual glance at the man behind, and lo, it was a friend of ye olden time with whom I hunted squirrels and went in swimming before either of us knew what higher criticism might be—if indeed we know yet. There were glad greetings and hearty hand grasps and a few pleasant hours of fraternal association. The time we spent together was unmarred by any discussion of varying views. To me the first man was no conservative and the second no progressive; they were my brethren in Christ. I will not have it otherwise. Albeit to each other they are critic and conservative, and must be until the Lord shall come to them in love and peace and largeness of vision. May he hasten his coming!

The disposition, prevalent just now, to mark every minister among us as belonging to one of two classes and then to array the classes against each other is deplorable, not to say unchristian and wickedly partisan. Why should we break each other's heads or, what is worse, hearts, in defending the truth which is amply able to take care of itself if we will preach it and do our duty as ministers? There is every reason why a preacher who desires to be useful to the Lord in this day of days should so conduct his ministry and so guard his utterances as to positively forbid any such classification. And this can be done—it is being done, indeed, by a great and growing body of our ministers. For big as these two parties may seem in the public prints, between the frigid intellectual liberty enjoyed by one and the torrid heat of ultra loyalty preferred by the other lies the broad temperate zone of Christian toleration. And here abides the middle-of-the-road minister for whom I speak my good word and to whom I extend my glad hand. Any tribute that I might pay him would but inadequately express his worth and certainly he merits no apology from me, so if I can but introduce him and then give place it will be enough.

His position is not one of compromise by any means, as the name given him might seem to suggest. Whoever dubbed Henry Clay the "Father of Compromise" paid him small compliment. To be persistently non-committal is no better than to cancel one's personality by forever assuming an attitude of bland acquiescence. Who loves that character celebrated in a poem of Will Carlton's and known everywhere by his monotonous addition to whatever is said, "Them's my sentiments tew"?

Nor does this man I have set myself to describe pride himself in his skill as a contestant. We have heard of a warlike citizen who "contests every inch of ground and fights over every blade of grass." But the wise soldier does not fight that way. The wise man of to-day does not give battle in behalf of every proposition nor does he carve the figure of a dove on his coat of arms and sign a treaty of eternal peace. He simply works and watches and keeps his powder dry, till a question worth fighting over is before him, and then he enters the lists in earnest. Such a man does not fight as one that beateth the air. He has generously granted the preferences of others on every point not absolutely essential to the chief aim in view and his right to make a final stand will not be denied, nor will his power to defend it be easily matched.

The man-in-the-middle-of-the-road, then, is the man who sees the ultimate from afar and conserves his strength to give battle in its behalf. Popular conflicts ever rage about the visible and effervescent; he cares but for the essential, the indispensable, and will not contend save when its interest is at stake.

This instinct for finality should be encouraged and cultivated among us to-day. It will save many a useful man from chasing the wary jack-o'-lantern in lowlands of theological speculation. And save, too, perchance, many a church from disruption by fixing the faith of leaders on the one thing needful. Of two extreme views on any matter it is of small importance to the minister which prevails till it be settled in which direction ultimate and real benefits are to be sought. But once let rightness identify herself with one side, and the course chosen will be everything. If we concern ourselves chiefly with issues not germane to the cause of the gospel the loss to us is out of all proportion greater than that sustained by the cause we serve. The cause can get along in some kind of fashion without us, and will do so, but we shall make poor headway getting along without the cause.

The Mission of the Christian College

M. L. Bates

The field of a small college is defined by its inherent limitations. A small faculty and a small enrollment can provide neither teachers nor students for a wide range of elective courses. Library and laboratory facilities are usually too meagre to permit of extensive specializing. These limitations distinctly separate the small college from the university. The business of the university is to train specialists. The business of the college is to develop men. Each is of incalculable value. Each aids the work of the other. The college may begin the work of special training. The university furthers the development of men. The essential thing to recognize is that the mission of the small college is not to give technical, professional or other specialized training, but to offer those general courses which experience has found to be most effective in the development of power and character.

The small college may properly emphasize one or another department of its work according to the particular need of its constituenty. In this one field specalized courses may profitably be offered as the demand may require. Such specialization gives an institution a distinct mission and individuality without impairing its characteristic advantages as a small college.

Between the high school and the graduate schools of the university are the four years of college. In the life of the student this period commonly falls between the ages of eighteen and twenty-three. In them the high school boy becomes the college trained man, ready to enter upon the study and work of a particular calling. The degree of success he will attain in his vocation will be largely determined by the discipline he has received in his college course. The use he will make of his vocation in service to society will be largely determined by the ideals he has gained from his college associations.

The small college possesses distinct advantages for providing the needed discipline and associations for this strategic period of youth. Her very limitations are her strength. Just as in the university the narrowed field of study conduces to thoroughness in scholarship, so in the small college the narrowed field of personal association conduces to effective character building. Personal contact is the most important factor in education. Nowhere are conditions so favorable for close personal contact between teachers and students as in the small college. Where the enrollment does not exceed three or four hundred every student knows each member of the faculty, and feels the impress of his personality. At this, the most vital point in educaion, the small college posseses unique advantage.

The distinctive mission of the Christian college is marked by its emphasis rather than by its limitations. Christian colleges have been founded because men believed that the ideal life, the adequate motive for its realization, and the ultimate hope of humanity are to be found only in Jesus Christ. If these colleges continue to be Christian in fact as well as in name it will be because in them the culture of Christian character and Christian ideals continues to be their first concern.

This emphasis is not without its dangers. Supreme stress upon Christian character may lead to tolerance of low educational standards. Zeal for the peculiar tenets of a religious body may develop into sectarian prejudices and intolerance. Effort to cultivate constantly and in all temperaments a religious fervor may produce a demonstrative sentimentalism or a professional piety which has no root in the actual life and must prove barren of all moral fruitage. Though these weaknesses are not uncommon they are by no means necessary. There is no good reason why a Christian college should be content with inferior educational standards, or dissipate its religous convictions in excesses of religious emotion.

The mission of the Christian college is to conserve and cultivate during the trying period of intellectual growth and re-adjustment an intelligent, vital faith in the divine person and mission of Jesus Christ. Without such conviction the Christian ideal of righteousness can never be attained and the Christian ideal of service can never be realized.

All that I have said of limitations and advantages of the small college is true of Hiram College. All I have said of the dangers and mission of a Christian college is true of Hiram College. The aim of my administration will be:

To develop men rather than to train specialists; to magnify the personal factor in education; to foster democratic ideals in all student relations; to conserve and strengthen intelligent vital faith in the divine person and mission of our Lord; to train character and inspire ambition consistent with the profession of such a faith; to cultivate a religious life that is above sectarianism and deeper than sentimentalism; to set and maintain educational standards equal to those of the best institutions in our country.

The particular mission which gives Hiram individuality among institutions of its kind, is revealed in the record of her alumni. Of her 600 living graduates, 56 per cent are preachers, teachers, missionaries or social settlement workers. They are rendering efficient service in every continent. A very large percentage of those in other vocations are leaders in movements for social betterment in their respective communities. The distinctive mission of Hiram College is to train and inspire young men and young women for altruistic service. To the worthy accomplishment of this mission my administration shall be devoted.—From the Inaugural Address, May 20, 1908.

Lesson VI. The Canon of the New Testament

H. L. Willett

The twenty-seven books of the New Testament are a unique and most important collection. This fact is often expressed by the statement that they belong to the "Canon of Scripture, or that they are "canonical." The word "canon" signifies a "rule" or measure. It implies that these books meet the tests applied by the church to various writing to determine their right to be called Scripture. The writings which did not meet this test have been excluded from the New Testament as "Uncanonical" or apocryphal.

The growth of the idea of the canon was gradual, and our list of New Testament books was recognized only as the church developed its sense of the value of the apostolic and other early Christian writings. The story of the development of the canon forms one of the interesting chapters in the history of Christianity.

To the apostles the Scriptures were the books of the Old Testament and the other related books which are included in the apocrypha of the Old Testament. Throughout the early Christian writings the word "Scripture" is applied only to the older Jewish literature. There was as yet little need of written documents in the Christian communities. The living oral story of the life of Jesus was a common and priceless possession.

When the apostles began to write letters to the churches or to individuals, or to set down portions of the story of Jesus and the truths of the gospel, it was not at first felt that these writings were Holy Scripture, or to be revered as of equal authority with the Hebrew Scriptures. Such writings were prized as the utterances of the friends and companions of the Lord, but it was only later that they became elevated to the rank of scared books.

The first step in this direction was the collection of such writings into small groups or bodies of epistles and other fragments of Apostolic writing. Pul himself suggested this in a limited way (1 Thess. 5:27; Col. 4:16). Such collections must have been numerous, the result of copying the writing of the apostles and their associates, and thus preserving them in the various churches for purposes of teaching and discipline.

There is clear evidence that such small collections of apostolic writings were in existence in the second century, differing from each other in the extent of the writings included. Clement of Rome (93-96 A. D.) wrote to the church at Corinth, mentioning Paul's first epistle to them. Ignatius (110-117 A. D.) in writing to the church at Ephesus quotes from Paul's epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. And Polycarp, about the same period, in writing to the Philippians, refers to Paul's letters to that church. About 140 A. D. Marcion made a collection which included the Gospel of Luke, and ten of Paul's epistles. Papias (145-160 A. D.) writes of the Gospel or Mark as the rescript of Peter's teaching composed by John Mark, and it is apparent that in his day dependence on the oral narrative of the life of Christ began to yield to a high estimate of written documents. Justin, his contemporary employs our four written Gospels.

Tatian, a pupil of Justin, compiled (160-170 A. D.) the Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Four Gospels, an interwoven story of the life of Christ, taken from all four of this time these four books were accepted as the authentic sources for the life of the Lord. The recently discovered Sinaitic Syriac version of the Gospels of the same period is an added proof of the same fact. Of course the writing of Paul had already been recognized as worthy of high honor, and other documents which the Christian communities regarded as entitled to similar appreciation were in circulation.

Turtullian (200-210 A. D.) was the first to divide the secred writing into the Old Testament and the New Testament, thereby making the latter of equal value with the former. He also divided the New Testament into four parts; the Evangelists, the Acts, the Pauline Section and the writings of John. In this period it was held that the books that were worthy of a place in the collection must be apostolic writings. Gradually other books which could not lay claim to be the product of apostolic hands were admitted, on the ground that they were the work of "companions of the apostles." Such were Hebrews, James and Jude, and in spite of diffficulties other writings were recognized, such as 2 John, 3 John and 2 Peter.

The final formation of the New Testament Canon with the present number of books, twenty-seven in all, was therefore not a matter of sudden decision, but was the result of a slow process in which the entire church had a part. It is sometimes said, especially by Roman Catholics, that the Canon was decided by the Council of Trent. This is an error. The decision of that Council was merely a recognition of the judgment already arrived at by the universal church. And the test which was appplied by the church in all its history was not that of apostolic authorship, much as that was prized, but, as Luther pointed out, it was that of the appeal which the individual books made to the soul of the believer. External testimony to the date and authorship of a work of Holy Scripture is valuable, and in many cases it can be obtained. But in the last issue the proof of the inspiration and value of a book is its witness to the Spirit of God within it. And of this fact every regenerate soul is competent in some true sense to be the judge.

In the use and appreciation of the books of the Bible every person makes his own canon of Scripture. We may reverence the judgment which has selected these twenty-seven books to constitute the New Testament, but our personal canon of Scripture includes only those books we use and enjoy, and no more. It should serve to deepen one's sense of responsibility for the right use of the Bible to remember this fact. So far as we are concerned there might as well be no other books of the Word of God than the ones we read and love.

Love is the yearning desire for what is best in any relation.

Love is to the soul like food to the body. Then love and live.

Hate is to the soul like poison to the body. Then forgive but forget not the lesson.

Faith is to the soul what strength is to the body. Then develop the soul by overcoming evil.

Motives are to the soul as acts to the body. Let motives be right that sins be forgiven.

The Sunday School--The Seven by the Sea*

H. L. Willett

There is something very significant about this twenty-first chapter of John. It hardly seems likely that it was contemplated in the original plan of the Gospel. The story really closes with the previous chapter. The author there finished his argument, gave his last words, and laid down his pen. But something more came to him as of such value that it could not be ommitted. Indeed it is very wonderful that the evangelists were able to restrain their desire to tell the life of Christ far more fully than they did. Had they been conscious that their testimony would be our only source of knowledge concerning that wonderful life, could they have resisted the impulse to tell more?

All the way through the Fourth Gospel the reader is conscious that the author wished to convince the world "that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh." The danger of allowing the phantom theory of an unreal Christ to gain currency was too great to be permitted. So that even after the narrative was finished, there was the temptation to add just one more item to the long list that might convince the reader "that Jesus is the Christ, the son of the living God." To whatever impulse we owe the addition of this beautiful incident, we may well be grateful for it.

"I Go Fishing."

The disciples had returned to Galilee. Most of them lived in that region. Of all the number, Judas alone was a Judean; and Judas had gone to his own place. These men lived near the sea where most of Jesus' days had been spent. They did not know when they should see the Master again. He had given them to understand that he would meet them in Galilee. Meantime they must find something to do. In the days gone by they had lived on the offering of the people, who freely provided for the little group. Now they must begin again the task of self-support, unless Jesus should point out some other way.

So Peter said he would go back to the nets. It was no sign of defection from the service of the Lord. Nothing could be less probaly than the conjecture that the disciple who had only a few days before made the awful mistake of retreating under fire, and to whose broken heart Jesus had brought comfort by the gracious word, "Go tell my disciples and Peter," would forget again, even to the end of his days. He was not forgetful, but only anxious lest those dependent on him should come to need. When he took this step, the other fishermen in the group went with him.

Peter's Question.

It was after a fruitless night that the message of the Lord came to them. So it had been with them in earlier days. Jesus had called them after an unsuccessful night on the sea. Dissappointment is often the best preparation for greater things. Yet they hardly knew him when they saw him. John had indeed divined the truth as soon as the Lord spoke, while they were yet in the boat. John said in a whisper, "It is the Lord!" But it was Peter who plunged in to be first at Jesus' side. The Fourth Gospel never lets us forget the contrast between these two men.

But the great scene in this drama was the questioning of Peter. It had been his privilege, freely exercised, to ask questions of all kinds and upon all occasions. Sometimes they had been pertinent and sometimes impertinent. But Jesus had evermore met them with patience, and answered them after the manner of the great teacher that he was. Now he was to do the questioning himself, and Peter would never forget it.

Peter And The Ten.

There had been an occasion in which Peter said to the Lord in the presence of the other disciples, "Though all men should forsake thee, yet will I not." It takes but a limited imagination to see that in those words Peter meant to say that it would not astonish him to find the others of the company wanting at the time of crisis. But for himself, it would never be so. Now by the sea-side, after the terrible experiences of the denial and the passion, Jesus asks, as if to bring with humbling remembrance the thought of his great mistake, "Simon, son of John, lovest thou me more than these?" How did he stand now in comparison with the ten, who if not valiant, had at least been faithful?

But Peter did not see the deeper meaning in Jesus' words, and answered as he might have done at any former moment in his life. Of course, he loved him; the Master knew that he loved him. There was nothing more to be said. But Jesus, having failed to find the deeper levels of Peter's nature, with his question, made another effort. He must keep the question before him till it penetrated his inmost soul. So again, the second time he asks the same thing, and receiving the same answer, gives him the same admonition, "Feed my sheep."

The Triple Question

Efforts have been made to discover hidden and cryptic meanings in the Savior's use of the two words for love, and in his change of the form of command from "lambs" to "sheep." To be sure it is possible to play with minute variations of this kind, but it is usually at the expense of missing the greater value of the scene. In the common speech of the day the two words for love meant the same thing, though they were capable of different shades of meaning. When Jesus bade Peter feed his sheep, he pointed him to that pastoral service which included the shepherding of all the flock, old and young.

The true meaning of Jesus' question is found in the insistence with which it was repeated. At first Peter took it as a commonplace of inquiry and command. The second time the words gave him disquiet, and made him wonder why the Lord should speak of the matter so soon again. But the third time, they went to his heart like and arrow. Over his soul there rolled the mighty tide of sorrow and remorse, for had he not denied the Master three times over? It all came back to him with a humbling sense of blame and ill-desert. To be sure the Lord had forgiven him, and summoned the penitent and stricken man to his side with words of comfort. But now he knew that the sin of the past must not be lightly forgotten. Rather must it be the ground and occasion of a new and tender loyalty that should never cease.

The Great Motive.

"Yes, thou forgavest, but with all forgiving
Canst not renew mine innocence again.
Make thou, O Christ, a dying of my living;
Purge from the sin, but never from the pain."

The motive which Jesus sought to discover in this vibrant, impulsive Galilean is the only one that avails to keep one true to the royal tasks of life. Every other breaks down in the stress of battle or the weariness of delay. Many motives seem to allure us to the work of the ministry, to missionary service, to the teaching of Sunday school classes, to redemptive effort in behalf of the unfortunate. But the days are long, and the results are slowing in coming, and courage wavers and questions are raised. It is then that one motive alone can abide the test, and keep faith strong and courage high. It is the motive which the Savior's question reveals, "Lovest thou me?" Everything else fades away. Love alone abodes.

"Love is strong as death. Many floods cannot drown it. A very flame of the Lord is love."

"Ay, and when prophecy her tale hath finished,
Knowledge hath faded from the trembling tongue,
Love shall survive, and love be undiminished,
Love be imperishable, love be young."

The Prayer Meeting--True Manliness

Topic for June 17. 1 Cor. 16:13-14; Eph. 6:10

Silas Jones

Is there a false manliness, as the statement of our text implies? Not in reality, but such a thing exists in the imagination of certain people. Braggadocio is by them substituted for modest self-assertion, self-restraint is despised, and the love that seeks not is own is incomprehensible.

MINUTE-MEN.

The manly man is alive to all his opportunities. He is ever looking for information concerning duty. As a citizen he accepts the help of the best qualified men in order that he may vote intelligently. As a disciple of the Lord he is open to suggestion concerning the work of the church. If there is political wickedness in his neighborhood, he is aware of it. He does not have a blind eye for use when his party is corrupt. If there are poor people in his town, he knows who they are, and what he may do for their advantage. He is not grumbling because the church is losing its hold on the men or the young people, but he is asking how these classes are being reached in other places.

A STEADFAST FAITH.

The manly man believes in God, in men, in himself. Because he believes in God, he is not opinionated. He reaches out after all the truth that God has for him. He honors the faith of the child, but he knows that when he becomes a man he must put away childish things. The God of his manhood is a greater God than the God of his childhood. Education is not the gathering of facts, it is the expansion of the mind and heart. He can look the facts in the face. The church needs men of this sort. They will make mistakes, but not the fatal mistake of shutting their eyes to the light. A church that puts a ban on open-mindedness is a dying institution. The world has no confidence in it, and it has no confidence in itself or God.

THE CO-OPERATIVE SPIRIT.

The boy who picks up his marbles and quits the game because he cannot have his way has started on the wrong road. Unless some one teaches him his error, he will come to old age a disappointed man and a nuisance to society. Habits must be formed with reference to those about us. Even the liquor men are coming to see this. The American Brewers' Review is quoted as saying: "There is an evident and apparently inevitable tendency more and more to subordinate individual freedom to the larger interests of the community. The last two centuries mark the age of individualism at its height. We seem to be emerging from that age into one of greater collectivism. The so-called personal liberty argument in behalf of alcoholic drink loses more and more its force. Consideration of the public welfare continues to grow and overshadow the rights of the individual." If the public welfare is promoted, the rights of the individual will be protected. This doctrine of greater collectivism is capable of wider application in the church. The kindness which Christianity inculcates has often led to the toleration in the church of persons who will destroy what they cannot control. There may be a place in the church for persons of this kind, but it is not the place for leadership. If there is a man or woman in any congregation of believers whose attitude toward proposals of other members is such that there is danger of a church fight if his or her plans are disregarded, the solemn duty of the congregation is to find an occasion at once to assert its right to self-government and its determination to be independent of individuals with whims. That action will be a lesson in the spirit of co-operation.

Christian Endeavor--Choosing a Life Work

Topic for June 14. 1 Kings 3:5-15.

The first thing is to recognize and acknowledge that we are not our own, but belong to Christ, and that we are not to live unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us and who bought us with his own precious blood. If we think we are our own masters and that our lives are given to us to do as we please with them, we shall choose one way. If we realize that we are not our own, but Christ's, and that our lives are to be invested as trusts from him, we shall choose another way.

It will follow from this that we shall act on the principles of Christ, and rule our life by the same laws by which he ruled his. Now the dominating principle of Christ's life was not pleasure or gain or ease. All around us men and women live for these things. "How much can I get?" they ask. "What are you going to do when you are graduated?" a college professor's wife asked a student. "I am going to take the first job that has money in it," was his reply. Christ acted otherwise. He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and, King though he was, he was among men as one who serves. "What use can I make of my life?" is the right law.

And yet not only use. The great question is not, "Where am I needed?" but, "Where am I needed most?" Not, "Where can I do good?" but, "Where can I do most good?" We have but one life to live. We cannot afford to put it to the second best uses. The good is a great enemy of the best. It keeps away from the best If God would let us go to some of the neediest places in our own land, we should many whom the bad could not keep away. not stay where the need is less, and the same principle should apply to all the world.

We should not be hindered from taking up any life-work because it is out of the convential, but neither on the other hand are we to trun aside from any life-work because it is ordinary and common-place. God needs housekeepers and clerks and tradesmen and professional men and women of all sorts, as well as missionaries and martyrs.—R. E. Speer.

A RECITATION.

Let the following poem by Rev. S. Winchester Adriance, entitled "At Life's Outset," be committed to memory and recited in the meeting.

We are Thy servants, mighty God,
With purpose clad, for service shod;
Thy voice rings clear and loud to all;
They are true souls who heed Thy call.

Help us to be and not to seem,
To dare real deeds, not idly dream;
Lest after dreams we wake to find
Our work has left us far behind.

Large is the land we must subdue,
As from the heights of hope we view
The fields that lie so fair beyond,
By Thy rich grace and sunshine crowned.

Within us hope with purpose joins;
Girded for service are our loins;
Without us are the world's great needs;
Equip us, Lord, for faithful deeds.

Obedient to Thy just command,
With heart and voice, with head and hand,
We go to meet each opening day
That leads us farther on our way.

Why ought every one to have some useful occupation? 2 Thess. 3:10-12.

What was Jesus' example in regard to work? Mark 6:3; John 5:17.

How did Jesus esteem his life-work? John 4:34; 17:4.

W. J. Wright was in Milwaukee, Wis., last Sunday, where Claire L. Waite is accomplishing a notably successful work. Bro. Wright spoke at the church and mission.

J. G. Waggoner preached the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class in Canton, Ill. The local papers gave full space to the sermon, which was on "The Higher Life."

The commencement week at Cotner University, Bethany, Neb., opens June 5 and ends with the exercises of commencement day, June 11. Charles S. Medbury, of Des Moines, Ia., will deliver the address on Thursday.

Noah Garwick, minister of the church in Waterloo, Ia., had the help of G. A. Hess in the dedication recently of their remodeled building. The property now is worth $11,000, and offers many more conveniences for the work of the church.

The commencement exercises at Carlton College, Bonham, Tex., were held in the college auditorium, Wednesday, May 27. There are eight young women in the graduating class. The college has had a successful year.

James Egbert is pastor of our churches in Anaconda and Deer Lodge, Mont. In the Anaconda church he has organized a class which will study the book by Jeremiah W. Jenks on "The Social Significance of the Teaching of Jesus."

M. L. Pontius has been employed for another year by the congregation in Taylorville, Ill. Appreciation of his leadership is manifest in an increase of $500 a year in salary. The work of the church has been prosperous under direction of the capable minister.

The West End church of Richmond, Va., of which Harry P. Atkins is pastor, is making extensive improvements in its property, and the building plans are now being pushed to what is hoped will be an early completion. Bro. Atkins and his members at the West End are to be congratulated upon this forward movement.

The Eureka Chautauqua, under the direction of A. W. Taylor, will be held beginning July 2, 1908, on the college campus at Eureka. This enterprise was begun only last year, but its success was early achieved, and it undertakes the second session with assurances of success and improvement. Mr. Taylor is to be congratulated upon his work in the Eureka church and community.

The Sunday school of the Evanston (Ill.) Christian church has arranged to send its pastor, O. F. Jordan, as its delegate to the International Sunday School convention at Louisville, Ky., June 18-23, bearing his expenses. This school aims to keep in touch with all the interdenominational activities of the Sunday school movement. Mr. Jordan will probably take the side trip to Mammoth Cave in connection with the convention.

Ray Eldred, of Bolenge, Africa, writes that 56 new converts have just been baptized there. This makes the membership of the church over 500. The Sunday school has 1,000 in attendance. The native church now supports 48 native evangelists. The Belgian government has granted the site for the new station at Longa, far up on the Bosira river. The ground is being cleared, and Ray Eldred will go at once from Bolenge to occupy this strategic field among these cannibal tribes.

The Greek department of Drake University gave a presentation in English of the Greek drama, "The Antigone of Sophocles," on the evening of May 20, 1908, in the Drake auditorium. The custom of giving Greek plays has become quite popular in educational institutions of the country, and we are glad to see that Drake has followed the example set by the leading universities. The translation of the choral odes of the play was made from the original by Prof. Kirk, and the music of the play, based on the old Greek models, was also composed by him. The training of the members of the cast was under the direction of the department of public speaking and oratory, and the direction of the chorus was in the hands of Professor Evans, of the Conservatory of Music.

If some zealous brother who is qualified to occupy a high school teacher's position as teacher of history, ancient and modern, and desires to share in home missionary work in Colorado will communicate with me, furnishing credentials, he may learn of an opportunity. A principalship of a small high school will also be vacant, also several positions in grades. An early application will be necessary. Address Leonard G. Thompson, Corresponding Secretary Colorado Christian Missionary Society, 243 South Lincoln street, Denver, Col.

Charles R. Hudson, of Frankfort, Ky., preached the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class of Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky. The service was held in the Broadway church, May 17. The commencement address was delivered May 2 by President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College. Commencement week included also the annual recitals and concerts, the annual art exhibit and the presentation by the Marlowe Club of a three-act farce comedy, "The Elopement of Ellen."

WORKS ALL DAY.

And Studies at Night on Grape-Nuts Food.

Some of the world's greatest men have worked during the day and studied evenings to fit themselves for greater things. But it requires a good constitution generally to do this.

A Georgia man was able to keep it up with ease after he had learned the sustaining power of Grape-Nuts, although he had failed in health before he changed his food supply. He says:

"Three years ago I had a severe attack of stomach trouble which left me unable to eat anything but bread and water.

"The nervous strain at my office from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m. and improper food caused my health to fail rapidly. Cereals and so-called "Foods" were tried without benefit until I saw Grape-Nuts mentioned in the paper.

"In hopeless desperation I tried this food and at once gained strength, flesh and appetite. I am now able to work all day at the office and study at night, without the nervous exhaustion that was usual before I tried Grape-Nuts."

"It leaves me strengthened, refreshed, satisfied; nerves quieted and toned up, brain-waste restored, and intellect brightened. I would have been a living skeleton, or more likely a dead one by this time, if it had not been for Grape-Nuts."

The South Dakota convention will meet at Armour, June 18-21. Geo. W. Muckley, A. McLean and W. R. Warren and other prominent workers will make addresses. Lodging and breakfast will be furnished to delegates who notify Timothy Norton, Armour, S. D.

A letter from Leslie W. Morgan, pastor at Hornsey, London, speaks of the serious loss suffered in the church in Southhampton by the death of Mr. Misselbrook, who for many years had been a leading worker in that church. He was engaged in extensive wholesale grocery business, and was a generous giver to the church and the cause of New Testament Christianity in England. Mr. Morgan was pastor of the Southhampton church for several years, and his wife is a daughter of Bro. Misselbrook. Bro. Morgan reports the work at Hornsey as prospering.

The church in Danbury, Conn., and its Sunday school have raised a sum of $1,205 to assist the congregation in Bridgeport, Conn., in the erection of a new church house. E. Jay Teagarden has been the minister in Danbury for almost nineteen years. At the annual meeting held a short time since, it was reported that $6,104.27 has been raised for all purposes during the past twelve months. Of this amount $1,882.82 was for missionary enteprises. The Ladies' Aid Society has just completed the redecoration of the interior of the house at an expense of $700.

THE CHICAGO CHURCHES.

C. C. Morrison reports three additions May 24 to the Monroe Street church.

Charles A. Young, of Santa Ana, Cal., is in the city on business.

There is talk of establishing an interdenominational Christian daily newspaper in Chicago.

Clarence Rainwater, of Des Moines, Ia., is preaching for the Garfield Buolevard congregation.

S. G. Buckner, pastor of the Harvey church, has received a call to Elkhart, Ind., one of the most promising fields in that state. Mr. Buckner has accomplished excellent results in Harvey during his two pastorates in that suburb.

Richard W. Gentry, recently of Columbia, Mo., will preach for the First church during the summer. Negotiations between the First church and the Memorial Baptist congregation seem to promise an early union of these two bodies.

Herbert Kaufman, one of the most successful advertising men in New York City, was the speaker last Monday night when a permanent organization was effected among the men of the Irving Park church. The new brotherhood will begin its work with a large membership. W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of the church, has been called to Cleveland by the serious illness of his wife, who is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Teachout.

The Playground Association of Chicago will celebrate its annual Play Festival on June 20 in Ogden Park, Center avenue and Sixty-third street. This association is doing a splendid work establishing playgrounds in the poorer sections of the city, where the children have no place to play except back alleys or dirty, narrow streets. They solicit the help of all Christian people. Prof. Graham Taylor is the Secretary of the association.

The second lawsuit for the property of the First church, Waukegan, Ill., brought by E. N. Tucker, a former pastor, and others, has been decided in favor of the First church. It is probable that no appeal will be made from this decision. A recent men's banquet of the church was attended by forty men. Richard W. Gentry and Edward A. Ott were the chief speakers. R. L. Handley is pastor.

SECOND DISTRICT CONVENTION, ILLINOIS.

The convention of the second district in Illinois convened at the Evanston church May 20, 21. The attendance was good, there being a registration of a hundred and twenty-five out-of-town delegates with perhaps others who failed to register. The weather was fine, and Evanston was resplendent in her spring coat of green.

The convention did not have morning sessions. The first day was given over to the work of the C. W. B. M. The second day was occupied chiefly with the work of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. The afternoon of the first day, Miss Thompson and Miss Griffin, the well-known traveling officers of the C. W. B. M. in Illinois spoke in their usually interesting way. In the evening, Professor Wallace Payne of the Bible Chair in the university, Lawrence, Kans., spoke on the Centennial ideals of the C. W. B. M. His message was one of optimism and he expressed the conviction that in some ways the centennial ideals might have been made larger. On the afternoon of the second day, H. H. Peters the Field Secretary of Euureka college, spoke on the problem of education among the Disciples. The address was followed by a lively discussion which gave expression to a variety of points of view. Clarence DePew spoke on Sunday school work, giving large place to the teacher-training campaign now going forward. He was followed by Parker Stockdale, who presented the status of the common work of the district. In the evening, J. Fred Jones discussed the missionary problem in Illinois with humor and sense. He was followed by Joh W. Thomas, Vice President of the Chicago Christian Business Men's Association. As his organization has undertaken the financing of the state convention, and is now in the midst of a successful campaign to raise a $10,000 centennial fund for Chicago work, he commanded attention not only for the sake of his practical presentation of the convention problem, but because of the activity of the group which he represented. The proposition of having the greatest convention ever held in Illinois, received great impetus.

The ladies of the church served meals and entertained in such a way as to merit the mark of appreciation which they received.

ILLINOIS CHRISTIAN EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION

The assiciation has planned to secure 5,000 members by the centennial and in order to do this we need the co-operation of all those interested in higher education.

I expect to spend most of May and June in the Third district making a thorough and systematic canvass of the churches in the interest of the assiciation.

THE FIRST TASTE.

Learned to Drink Coffee When a Baby.

If parents realized the fact that coffee contained a drug—caffeine—which is especially harmful to children, they would doubtless hesitate before giving the babies coffee to drink.

"When I was a child in my mother's arms and first began to nibble things at the table, mother used to give me sips of coffee. As my parents used coffee exclusively at meals I never knew there was anything to drink but coffee and water.

"And so I contracted the coffee habit early. I remember when quite young, the continual use of coffee so affected my parents that they tried roasting wheat and barley, then ground it in the coffee-mill, as a substitute for coffee.

"But it did not taste right and then went back to coffee again. That was long before Postum was ever heard of. I continued to use coffee until I was 27, and when I got to office work, I began to have nervous spells. Especially after breakfast I was so nervous I could scarcely attend to my correspondence.

At night, after having coffee for supper, I could hardly sleep, and on rising in the morning would feel weak and nervous.

"A friend persuaded me to try Postum. My wife and I did not like it at first, but later when boiled good and strong it was fine. Now we could not give up Postum for the best coffee we ever tasted.

"I can now get good sleep, am free from nervousness and headaches. I recommend Postum to all coffee-drinkers.

FROM THE HUB OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

Summer is here at last. Less than three weeks ago we thought winter would never leave us, now we long for some of its cooling breezes. Our church services have not yet manifested any perceptible signs of falling off, and probably will not until the close of the public schools, the last week in June. Then everybody who can afford it, and many who cannot, get away from the city for two months. Vacations are taken more generally here in the north than in the south, the short, hot summers being felt more than when men are slowly prepared for it.

Our city churches here are planning a vigorous tent campaign for July and August. Already twenty-six churches are represented and the executive committee contains one minister from the Presbyterians, Baptists, Episcopalians, German Evangelical, Congregationalists, Reformed and Disciples. A large tent is to be used and moved several times during the season. Such concerted effort cannot fail in creating a better spirit of comradeship among the workers and ministers of the congregations thus engaged.

The Empire State is furnishing its quota of unshepherded churches. New York City (Lenox avenue and Fifty-sixth street), Pompey, Tully and Watertown each without ministers. The two New York churches are difficult fields and need the very best men we have. Report has it that B. Q. Denham's second ministry terminated with his second Sunday with Fifty-sixth Street, when he bade farewell to the church there forever. It was generally felt that the experiment would fail. Watertown has a fine new building in an excellent part of the city, and if the right man can get hold of things and lead some of the members into seeing things aright, it would soon become one of our strongest churches. Pompey and Tully are old churches located quite near to Syracuse, the former in an excellent farming village and the latter in a town of 800. Each has some fine people and offer opportunities for study and service for our Master.

The work here in Syracuse prospers. Central closed its forty-fifth year on the 20th of May with excellent reports of progress. There was a net gain in membership of 20, and this in the face of heavy withdrawals, leaving a present membership of 306. The total receipts were $5,455.49, not including $1,125.00 given by Mr. Carnegie for half of the new organ. Over $600 was collected for missions and benevolences. Our property has been put in excellent condition and the prospects for the immediate future look bright.

In the Second Church, Brother Stuffer has been doing great things this year and when the record of the work shall have been made it will show one of the finest fields in the state. Their annual meeting will be held next week and the report will be worth reading.

There is an opening for a mission study Sunday school in a rapidly growing section of this city, and if proper arrangements can be made a work will be started soon. At present the nearest church of any kind is over a mile distant and many homes of the Rooseveltian type are to be found in the neighborhood.

Our minds are turned to North Tonawanda, where during the last days of June the first of July, the state convention of our churches and societies will be held. The program committee is now at work on the list of speakers and hope soon to announce a feast of good things for all who attend.

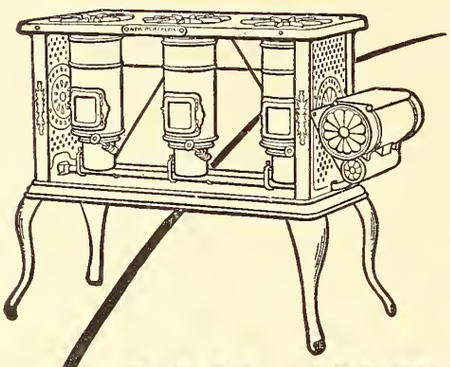
Hot Stove—Cool Kitchen



How do you expect to endure the broiling days of summer if you prepare all the food over a glowing coal fire?

You need a "New Perfection" Oil Stove that will do the cooking without cooking the cook. It concentrates plenty of heat under the pot and diffuses little or none through the room. Therefore, when working with the

NEW PERFECTION
Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove

the kitchen actually seems as comfortable as you could wish it to be.

This, in itself, is wonderful, but, more than that, the "New Perfection" Oil Stove does perfectly everything that any stove can do. It is an ideal all-round cook-stove. Made in three sizes, and fully warranted. If not with your dealer, write our nearest agency.

The Rayo Lamp

a substantial, strongly made and handsome lamp. Burns for hours with a strong, mellow light. Just what you need for evening reading or to light the dining-room. If not with your dealer, write our nearest agency.

INLAND EMPIRE DAY.

"Inland Empire Day" is to be observed by all our Christian Endeavor Societies on June 28th. The American Christian Missionary Society. Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati; Young Peoples Dept., H. H. Denton, Supt., has prepared programs and literature to help the Societies in observing the day, making it one of the greatest events for the societies of all the year. The purpose and aim, of course, is to secure for afferings from the Endeavor Socities for the evangelization of the "Inland Empire", —Utah, Idaho and Wyoming. This territory is the especial field for our young people in the program of Home Missions. I want to urge every society among us to order literature and observe the day. An effort is being made to bring 1,000 societies into line for this occasion.

If that result is accomplished we will not be ashamed of our contribution for Home Missions. Last year our Societies only gave $1,374.98 for this cause. This year we ought to give not less than $10,000.00. Why not? This is "our own, our native land" and our feet should be swift to preach the gospel of Christ to our fellow Americans. If you have not already done so, order literature today.

National Supt. CLAUDE E. HILL.

Still Time.—A long-haired man walking along the street met a little boy, who asked him the time.

"Ten minutes to nine," said the man.

"Well," said the boy, "at nine o'clock get your hair cut." And he took to his heels and ran, the aggrieved one after him.

Turning the corner, the man ran into a policeman, nearly knocking him over.

"What's up?" said the policeman.

The man, very much out of breath, said: "You see that young urchin running along there? He asked me the time, and I told him, 'Ten minutes to nine,' and he said, 'At nine o'clock get your hair cut.'"

"Well," said the policeman, "what are you running for? You've got eight minutes yet."—Hapgoods Opportunities.

Omaha—A meeting fruitful of many blessings, held by B. B Burton of Des Moines, for the North Side Christian Church of this city, closed last night with thirty-seven additions: twenty-two by primary obedience, four by letter, and eleven by statement. Having held a meeting in December, at which time our Bible school was well gleaned, there were but few additons from that usuall fruitful source. The additions were mostly adults and heads of familiees that will add to the strength and standing of the church.

Brother Burton is a great evangelist and completely captured the hearts of our people. His delivery is clear and logical, but never cold; his illustrations are clean and pointed; he possesses a natural wit that holds his audience from start to finish; his appeals to accept Christ are warm with feeling and as he stirs the depths of the emotions with a commanding pathos. Having traveled extensively at home and abroad and being a constant student of men and books, he is splendidly equipped to do the work of an evangelist and preachpreach the gospel of the Kingdom preach the gospel of the Kingdom of Christ As he has planned to give all his time to this great work there will, no doubt, be a constant and growing demand for his services.

CENTENNIAL STATE CONVENTIONS.

Kentucky is delighted to note the call from Missouri's state Board in this week's papers to join with her in a campaign for contennial state conventions throughout the nation. Kentucky is also glad to announce that for over a year she has been making preparation for the holding of just such a contennial convention in 1909. A special program committee has been appointed, composed of Cary E. Morgan, I. J. Spencer, H. W. Elliott, Mrs. Louella W. St. Clair, Mrs. S. K. Yancey and the writer, and the program is already well under way. Historic Lexington has been selected as the place for the holding of this convention, and surely no place other than Pittsburg could be found in the whole nation more appropriate for the holding of such a convention. Here the union of the followers of Barton W. Stone and of Thomas and Alexander Campbell was effected in 1832 and here the first cooperative missionary society of the brotherhood was organized in the same year resulting in the sending out of John Smith and John Rogers as evangelists.

It seems a rather remarkable coincidence that the state convention for 1908 in Kentucky is to be held in Hopkinsville, Sept. 21-24, where is to be culminated the union of our state missionary interests which have been divided for 35 years. Our state Bible School work has been for some years, but the state missionary interests are to be united in Hopkinsville just previous to our great contennial.

In this connection Kentucky may also point with pardonable pride to the fact that she has a definite contennial enterprise to which she is enthusiastically lending her every attertion in the endowment with $25, 000 of a Bible School department in the College of the Bible at Lexington Already about $5,000 of this state stands committed to help in this enterprise which means more directly to the Bible School cause than anything we have attempted in our history as a people. The services of John T. Brown, former editor of the Cchistian Weekly, have been secured to assist in the raising of the remaining $20.000, and he will give his whole time to this task from now until the Hopkinsville convention.

So Kentucky congratulates Missouri on the proposal referred to and hopes that all the states will join in the holding ofcontennial convertions.

WHAT DOES OHIO CARE FOR?

Ohio has just held her fifty-seventh annual convention at Columbus. Five hundred and fifty delegates gathered in the magnificent Broad Street Church where W. S. Priest ministers so successfully. The program was very strong. Returning home I ask myself, "What do the 88,000 Disciples of this state care for, what are they most interestd in." I answer as follows:-

(1) Temperance. When President Pinkerton announced that North Carolina had just voted dry the great audience applauded and cheered to the echo. When Wayne Wheeler, the attorney of the Anti-saloon League predicted that within the next few months 65 of the 88 counties of this state would vote dry a thunder of applause was heard. Old Ohio stands four-square for temperance and she is determined to fight the saloon to the very death.

(2) Sunday-schools. These stand next in importance in Ohio mind. Ohio boasts of Moninger, Welshimer, Darsie, Cook and many other Bible school experts. Teacher training was emphasized. The importance of growing a church up from the trained children was shown to be a vast improvement over revivalism. The latter was branded as an emergency method purely.

(3) Missions easily stood next in popular regard. State missions especially held prominent place, while all the others came in for appreciative consideration. Ohio was forced, however, for the first time in history to yield the palm to Illinois in Foreign and Kentucky in Home Missions. It must be remembered that Ohio has but 88,000 Disciples. The problem of the pastorless country church baffled the wisest when is was shown that 150 rural churches have no preaching nor pastoral care whatever.

(4) Great interest was manifested in the Brotherhood idea. The most of one session was devoted to the consideration of work for men. The Men's Bible Class, Men's Missionary Societies, and various kinds of men's clubs were discussed. Among these clubs those organized for social betterment, educational or purely social aims were most popular. No set form was demanded for all felt that local environment and personal must determine the type of organization. Every church was urged to have some kind of a men's brotherhood.

(5) Education. President Bates, the newly elected President of Hiram was the most towering man in the convention. Ohio will be loyal to Hiram and to him. Hiram has a bright future. Never before was the promise so bright. Endowment scholarship, attendance, religious life, prestige—Hiram has these in ever-increasing measure.

(6) Architecture. Many of the men had pictures of their new and beautiful church buildings which they delighted to show and all of us delighted to see. Ohio values ecclestical architecture. Ohio seems to care for the above things and in about this order.

name shall not be made public. He is not a man of large purse, but a man of large heart. He is practically giving his all and giving it as he is able to earn it and save it. He deems it a privilege to minister to the comfort of our Lord by ministering to his suffering little ones.

The other annuity is for $4,500. This from a good man and his wife who for a long time have had it in their hearts to do something for their less fortunate brothers and sisters. This gift is made for the benefit of aged dependent disciples, the preference being given to ministers and their wives. As compared with their possessions this gift lays Carnegie's in the shade. It is pretty nearly the widow's mite. It is being given with joy and thankfulness. The name is withheld for the present.

WHAT ABOUT A COOK-STOVE?

Now that summer time and "dog days" are just ahead, everybody who "summers" at home is considering how to simplify things and get the most comfort out of an uncomfortable situation.

We interview the ice-man; order thin clothes; plan to ease up here and relax there; but more than likely forget the one most important item in the whole hot-weather scheme—some means of doing the family cooking without the insufferable heat of a coal fire in the kitchen.

Everyone with experience knows how tiresome it is to stay in a stuffy room to prepare a meal, let alone the doing of a big baking. But everyone doesn't know how very easy it is to change a hot kitchen into a cool one, and do better cooking at the same time. Just add to your list of summer conveniences a New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove and you've done all that any one can do to lessen hot weather discomfort.

Wouldn't it be fine of a summer morning to step in the kitchen, put on the kettle, broil the steak, bake the muffins, filter the coffee and give the breakfast call in one fourth of the time you'd take to do it on a coal stove?

And wouldn't it be fine to be as cool when the breakfast was prepared as when you first entered the kitchen?

People who have tried it say that the New Perfection Oil Stove actually does everything in the line of cooking and do-or the worker.

Undoubtedly the reason is to be found in the blue flame principle on which the stove works.

A cylindrical chimney concentrates the heat at the stove top and in this way prevents surface radiation as in a coal or wood stove.

It is easy to see that this lessens very much the matter of personal discomfort in summer housekeeping.

So don't forget the New Perfection Oil Stove in your summer plans and you will have a comfortable kitchen and the best cook stove in the world.—Adv.

COMMENCEMENT WEEK AT OKLAHOMA CHRISTIAN UNIVERSITY

The first commencement week at Oklahoma Christian Univ. was a great success. With men on the program like J. W. M'Garvey, J. H. Garrison, F. M. Rains, J. H. O. Smith, J. H. Mohorter, Graham Frank, O. N. Roth, an a lot of Oklahoma boomers, it could not have been otherwise, and we had them all. The Oklahoma Christian Ministerial Association and the Educational Rally planned by Pres. Zollars, both combined with commencement exercises made the event a great one, and large numbers of people were present.

All were greatly and agreeably surprised at the progress the university has made. Three fine buildings are here, having a combined floor space of over two acres, all modern and splendidly equipped. All who have seen them, and are in a position to speak, say we have the finest plant in the brotherhood.

On Wednesday morning Judge Haymaker announced that he with other Witchita friends, would give $2,500 to the university, and in a few moments this was conditionally raised to $5,000. All felt that the university would be in splendid financial condition by September of this year. The outlook for students is splendid. By the time this appears in print the new catalog will be out, and all who wish one may receive one by addressing the Registrar, Miss Emma Hartshorn, care of the university.

The university has sixteen graduates this year from the various departments. One from the College of Liberal Adts, one from the College of Music, one from the College of Teachers, two from the Preparatory Department, and eleven from the Business Department. We feel that this is a very good year's record, especially for the first year, and that Pres. Zollars has accomplished the greatest year's work of his life.

The Oklahoma Christian Educational Association was formed, and will do all in its power to help the university. The officers are O. L. Smith, El Reno, President; Prof. O. L. Lyon, Enid, Vice-President; T. W. Blackman, Enid, Treasurer; Miss Emma Hartshorn, Enid, Recording Secretary, and Randolph Cook, of Enid, Corresponding Secretary. It is planned to carry on an active campaign in the interests of the university during the summer, and it is hoped that all friends of the university will assist.

RANDOLPH COOK,
Minister of Enid Church.

Count not success by what we gain,
But by what we resist.
We sometimes know our great ones
By the honors they have missed.

The greatest of all signs is that of service.

Reds and Blues Contest Buttons

REDS AND BLUES Contest plans have proved wonderfully successful in Y. M. C. A. work and are proving more so in Sunday school work. By making use of our Reds and Blues plans you can easily double your school membership in a month or six weeks. You can break up irregular attendance in a very short time. You can raise large sums of money for your needs. You can secure church attendance, bringing of lesson helps, bringing of collection, coming on time.

The Reds and Blues plans please because they set everybody at work heartily and enthusiastically and because each leaves the school in a healthy condition when the contest is ended.

Each Reds and Blues plan requires dividing the school into two sections—Reds and Blues and appointing captains, one or more, for each side, a social or other treat to be given at the close of the contest, when those on the winning side receive ice-cream and cake, and the losers crackers and cheese, or some other attraction to celebrate the close of the contest and the victory. That is to be paid for by the school. Complete instructions sent with each order.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net. postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

You know people who go on over hard roads with amazing serenity. Life is full of bitterness for them, but all the bitter experience is somehow sweetened. Loss and disappointmnt do not effect them as they do others. Even in the face of the direst of ills, they are composed and confident. They meet with celestial cheerfulness. Thus they go along the difficult way and do not falter or grow weary. How do they do it? What is the secret of it? The secret of it is that by faith they see God; as they go, they walk with God, holding the hand of God.

SOME KENTUCKY WORK AND WORKERS.

—There were two added in Clay county, as indicated by H. L. Morgan.

—Latonia is in a strenuous effort to raise by a whirlwind campaign $2,000 in sixty days. They have had paid in one tenth of that amount. Eight added—five by confession and baptism—others by letter. Work in every department doing well.

J. P. Bicknell in Wolfe and adjacent counties, gave 12 days to the field—baptized one in April. Fourteen added in May and much other good wrought.

—Four added in work of J. B. Flinchum in Breathitt county.

J. P. Bonwasser is to give up Bromley and L. A. Kohler will take up that field.

—C. M. Summers reports the work at Jackson as doing fairly well—conditions not very favorable. He baptized five and reclaimed two at another place.

—J. W. Masters was at work ony 12 days. His mother is very low and her death is expected at any time.

—W. J. Cooke had a fine month's work. Forty-eight added. Van Buren, Anderson county, and Forest Hill, Lexington, had his services. His next two meetings will be in Grant and Fleming counties. It may be possible for some needy church to secure him for a meeting or two in late summer or early fall, although most of his time is engaged.

—Z. Ball had a good month, adding seven and doing much other good.

—D. G. Combs was untiring in labors as usual. Fifteen baptisms, 38 added otherwise, one S. S. organized. He did work in Powell and Carter counties, as well a Wolfe.

—H. W. Elliott attended a number of conventions, district and county, besides attending the Ohio convention as fraternal delegate. He spoke at about fifteen different places and preached twenty-five sermons or addresses. He dedicated the new house of worship at Crittenden and raised enough money to pay all indebtedness and officiated at the ordination of a board of officers in a large country church. The receipts of the month amounted to $504.88—a gain over last May, and while we have lost some since the first of March as compared with the same date last year, we are still over $500.00 ahead of this date last year. We urge all the friends of our State work to use all diligence to meet their obligations to our State work and enable us to go to Hopkinsville with all debts paid and a record of which we will not be ashamed.

—Remember the State Convention at Hopkinsville—Sept. 21st to 24th. Begin now to plan to attend. We hope that many churches will send their preachers. Our South Kentucky brethren have voted to unite with us and we must go to Hopkinsville in such numbers as will evince our interest in the union of our State work. H. W. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

Several of the great religious bodies held their annual gatherings during the past month. May seems to be a favorite period for such gatherings. In England it is the accepted time for religious conventions. Practically all the churches send their representatives to London for the May meetings. It is a time of immense interest in the metropolis.

The Methodist Episcopal Church held its general conference in Baltimore. It was probably not by any intention, but is scarcely avoidable, that the chief interest felt in these great Methodist gatherings is the election of the Bishops. Eight were added to the list at the recent meeting. Among them were Dr. McIntyre, the famous preacher and lecturer of Los Angeles; Dr. Quayle, the well-known pastor of the St. James Church of Chicago, and Dr. Frank Bristol of Washington, who was President McKinley's pastor. It is not to be understood that the interests considered at this gathering were less important than those of former years, but the public concern was centered chiefly in the election of the Bishops.

The Presbyterians met in Kansas City. A notable feature of the gathering was the moderatorship of Dr. Fullerton, a leading representative of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, whose recent union with the regular Presbyterians was in a measure emphasized and ratified by this action. The Presbyterian Church has made notable advances in the past five years. The old period of credal revision and conflict between conservatives and radicals has given place to a time of aggressive work in the interest of the Kingdom of God. Perhaps the most notable tokens of this advance are the work among men, and the efforts made to interpret the church to the laboring classes. It is freely conceded that the Presbyterian Brotherhood is one of the most interesting and encouraging signs of life and activity in the church at the present time. The recent Brotherhood convention at Cincinnati was in some regards the greatest convocation of Christian men ever brought together. It has stirred up the men of several other churches to similar efforts. Not less significant is the work of the department of labor under the leadership of Rev. Charles Stelzle. He came from the workman's bench through the Y. M. C. A. to the ministry, and is perhaps doing as much to interpret the church to the workingmen and the workingmen to the church as any man in the nation. These two features of Presbyterianism mark a wonderful revival of activity in a communion which has always been regarded as conservative to a degree. Certainly no work is more inspiring to all the churches than that now being accomplished by the Presbyterians. The Disciples of Christ need to emphasize these two lines of work, men's organizations and the church and labor as among the important problems of the hour.

The Baptists met in Oklahoma City, and President Judson of the University of Chicago, was the presiding officer. A new interest in missionary extension is evident in the Baptist ranks, and a new spirit of consecration to the financial work of the church. The echoes of these three great conventions are now being caught by the churches throughout the land.

There is one suggestion as to the time for a national convention which comes from these gatherings. The Disciples of Christ are practically the only great body of people whose chief convocations are held in the autumn. It has long been felt by many of our people that October is a difficult time at which to secure a representative gathering. It is the time when ministers have just begun to organize their plans for the winter's work, and every moment is precious. It is difficult for them to leave their churches for a week or ten days. Business men are only recently back from their vacations, and every ounce of energy and every moment of time must be devoted to pushing the autumn and winter trade. Teachers, and especially college men, are just getting their courses started, and feel that it is practically impossible to take several days from the classroom even for such important interests as those of the convention.

On the other hand, May presents a period of radically different character. The work of the year is nearly over. With preachers and business men it is quite easy to arrange an absence such as the convention demands. With the college men the period falls in the days just preceding the final examinations, between the heavy work of the year and the climax of commencement; so that for them it is the best season in the twelve months, exeepting, of course, the impossible summer period of vacation. Then, too, the weather is usually all that could be desired in the month of May. The wisdom that has led the most of the other religious bodies to adopt this month as the time for the annual gatherings may well suggest to the Disciples the value of a change in their own convention calendar.

Of course there could be no thought of change either this year or next. The arrangements for New Orleans and Pittsburg are complete. But with 1910 we begin a second century of history. At that time it will be well to revise our methods of work sufficiently to bring them into harmony with the growing demands of the time, and we believe that two of the features which ought to find place in this revised program are the adoption of the plan of delegate conventions and the change of date of the annual convention from October to May.

IS THE CHURCH A CLUB?

The name church has a significance which has been lost sight of, the "called out," those who have been called out of the world. This was the early meaning of the church: it ought to be the meaning of the word church today. But unfortunately it is not, at least so far as the popular definition of the church goes. Suppose you ask the average person, what is the popular meaning of the word church? I dare say that he will tell you that it is much the same as the word club; he will say this and that church have men who call themselves ministers, whose business it is to address them twice on Sundays, shine well on public occasions, and visit from house to house and keep on good terms with all the members of his parish. They have their social time with their own set.

To the outside how do these things look? How does this appear for the man who is in need of the virtue which the church claims to have for him, and which it does not bring to him? When he turns over the leaves of his New Testament and there finds the early church casting out devils, going everywhere seeking the lost and purifying the lives of those with whom it comes in contact, what must be his feelings of disgust to find the professed custodians of these virtues living just such lives as he and his fellows are living? When will the church be able to reach and help such?

It can reach this class of men and accomplish these reforms only when it is itself morally clean. It must be both religious and moral. There has been a good deal of religion which was not moral. Religion and morality are the obverse sides of the same coin. One cannot be truly religious without being moral; one cannot be moral in the true sense without being religious.

Don't be whining about not having a fair chance. Throw a sensible man out of a window; he'll fall on his feet, and ask the nearest way to his work.—C. H.

Every man can be in love with his work if he will always think of how well he can do that work and not how easily he can do it.—Senator Beveridge.

Correspondence on the Christian Life.

George A. Campbell.

The Correspondent:—What is meant by the passage in I Cor. 15: 29? The verse reads as follows: "Else what shall they do who were baptised for the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why then are they baptised for them?"

The passage has bothered us all. There are various interpretations. Here is a simple one that commends itself to me. The Christians, some at least, were concerned about the salvation of their friends who died without hearing of Christ. As "there was no other name" by which salvation came they were sorely troubled. They found their escape in "baptised for the dead." This was a phase of the doctrine of substitution that has always had some place in the church and still lingers before the advancing ethical Gospel of Christ. All narrow conceptions of the Gospel seek some opening for a hope that is human.

Our hearts seek reasons for life when the reason itself gives none. The loop-holes in theology are most interesting. You know the loophole of the Disciples; God nowhere promises to save the unbaptised believers but in His mercy He may. Blessed loop-hole! I like it. It saves us God. Some day I trust our theology will not need loop-holes. But that day is not yet.

The Correspondent.—Can a deacon be a Scriptural one and not be married? Does not the third chapter of First Timothy require that he be "the husband of one wife"?

The key to the meaning of Paul is "one." Some had more than one wife. Christianity was to stand for the purity of the home and singleness of marriage. It would not do to have as leaders those who were compromised with a passing and false social system. This view is now the commonly accepted one.

The question, however, should have an answer of further reach. The organization that Christ wants, is the one that will do the work best. The leaders He wants are the best. If we become slaves to the letter of the New Testament organization we will miss its true significance. It was a growth. It grew out of the needs of the time. All organisms to be vital must have facility of adjustment. Just now the church is languishing because it has failed to adjust its organization to the needs of our time. The machinery of the church should no more be stationary than the machinery of electricity or of steam. We may have a reproduction of New Testament organization and still be scriptural. Failing to recognize this principle we continue to discuss the trifling questions of women keeping silence in the churches, whether an elder and a deacon should be married, etc., etc. God has given us brains, not to imitate but to think with. Ought the thing to be done? If so, how can we best do it? Every people must struggle with these two questions. In the struggle salvation is found.

The Correspondent.—Why can't all good people see that they ought to build up and not tear down? The destructionist is dangerous. Every preacher and every Christian surely ought not to be anything but builders. Faith, not doubt, saves the world. Construction, not destruction is what is ever needed. Atheism is always a destroyer. I detest the upsetters of faith."

The Pharisee thought Christ was a destroyer; and he was from the Pharisee's point of view. He ploughed right through their systems of falsities. He defended himself by saying "I come not to destroy but to fulfill." He only destroyed that which was in the way of fulfilling the truth. To doubt the false is to clear the way for believing the true. To cut away the poisoned portion is to give health a chance. The church of Christ will eventually be built upon simply the Truth.

Construction ought to be the object of all. He who tears down the system of indulgences is building up the true doctrine of repentance. He who helps to destroy the fatalistic doctrine of predestination is aiding in building up the truth of human responsibility. He who destroys the unbelievable tenet of infant damnation for the unbaptised innocents is clearing the way for a true conception of God.

To doubt error is to be prepared to believe in truth. No one can believe in the Copernican system until he has done with the Talmaic. If the true God is to reign in our hearts, the false gods must fall from their pedestals. The trouble about this whole matter of construction and destruction is that we are apt to get such a grip on non-essentials that if we see them toppling we think everything is going. A thousand faiths have died; but the Fairest of ten thousand abides. Discrimination is the remedy. Doubt the wrong. Believe the true; "know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Let our quotation this week be from Alexander Smith:

"'Tis pleasant, when blue skies are o'er us bending
Within old starry-gated Poesy,
To meet a soul set to no worldly tune."

"The Christ that Is to Be," published anonymously by the MacMillan Co., is a suggestive book; though somewhat out of the ordinary.

Dost Thou Believe on the Son of God?---II.

Earle Marion Todd

Intellectual interpretations are, to some minds, impossible; some can only feel. Some men, who could not for their lives interpret a great painting or a great piece of music, can feel it and be profoundly moved by it. To children, again, such interpretations are impossible, and we do them a great wrong by compelling them to make a confession in terms of the intellect of what they have apprehended only in terms of feeling. The little child has wonderful understanding in respect to truths that are intuitively discerned, but is utterly incapable of understanding the historical associations that give significance to the term "Christ," and to ask him if he believes that "Jesus is the Christ" is a piece of pure legalistic formalism, without any justification in reason. And when we go a step further and question him about Jesus' unique relation to God the case is even worse. It is an injustice to the child thus to divert its attention from the practical significance of the confession to intellectual and dogmatic consideration. It destroys the ethical value of the confession, and confirms the child in a false and distorted conception of Christianity. "Dost thou believe in Jesus Christ as thy Savior?" avoids this evil, and is sufficient.

Our preaching of Christ is not always scriptural; while aiming at being strictly so, we sometimes strangely miss the mark—like the Indian's tree, we lean backwards. Our survey of the apostolic preaching is not broad enough. The early preachers of the gospel preached Christ; we preach the divinity of Christ. They preached a person; we preach a dogma. Now it does no one any good to be told that Jesus is the Son of God; every man must find that out for himself, as Peter and the other disciples did,—"Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven." Jesus never told anyone of his unique relation to the Father; He left it for men to find out as they came to know him. When we begin again to preach Christ and not dogma, our preaching will be more effective.*

It is well for us to seek an intellectual interpretation of the Force that entered the world with Jesus, and that becomes a factor in the experience of every man that comes in contact with it. It is at least as legitimate as our endeavor to ascertain the source of the sun's heat, or the secret of the origin of life on the globe. And it is somewhat analogous. The sun's heat we know, and life we know; the love of Christ we know also, and his power to inspire hope in the hopeless, and give strength to the impotent, and victory to the broken and defeated. A better understanding of his Person may enable us to avail ourselves more fully of his fullness, therefore let us enter into the secret place with him, and commune with him, that we may know him with the intellect as well as with the heart,—that we may love him, as we love God, with the heart and soul and mind and strength.

* Cf. Kirkpatrick, art. "The Character of Christ." Hastings' D. C. G. i p 287—"The greatest foe to faith is the haste to construct dogmas about Christ before Christ is known." Cf. also Bruce, Apologetics, 399.

But let us regard these definitions of his Person as of value only as they bring him nearer to us and make his love and his grace more precious, and as they reveal to us, in him, a worthier estimate of ourselves, his brethren, and of the possibilities that inhere in our human nature. If my interpretation of his person is too "orthodox" to help my brethren, let me withhold it; if it is too "advanced" to meet their need, let me be dumb. But always let me lift him up, whose life, understand its secrets little as we may, is the light and the life of men.

And let us not think of our interpretations as final. The fact is an eternal fact. The advent of Christ in the last days of the Roman Empire was but the entrance into history of an eternal fact. We are not now alluding to the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ, but to the spiritual forces that became incarnate in the historical Jesus. Our interpretations of this fact are of our time and country; they are partial, tentative, progressive. Nature is an eternal fact, but our interpretations of nature are partial, tentative, progressive. Newton could see further than Descartes because he stood on giants' shoulders. But Lord Acton could see further than Newton, and Sir Oliver Lodge can see further than Lord Acton did. Our interpretations of Christ progress toward such an understanding of his Person as shall outshine those of Paul and John.

But the vital thing is that we should believe in Him, as the farmer, not the astronomer, believes in the sun,—that we should believe in him as the ideal of manly character; that we should believe in his simplicity, his gentleness, his goodness, in his sympathies, his indignations, his enthusiasms, in his unselfishness, his patience, his purposefulness, his self-denying devotion to the will of God; that we should believe in him as our Saviour from selfishness, envy, hate, greed, and as our Leader in the war against social and industrial injustice, against lying and slander and back-biting and unbrotherliness; that we should believe that the things he said were worth saying, are worth saying, are worth saying at any cost of loss or shame or misunderstanding or secterian persecution or soeial ostracism; that we should believe that the things he set himself to do, and that have not been done, were and are infinitely worth doing, and that it is high time his brethren were setting themselves whole-heartedly to the task of doing them. The last word has not been said about the evil of creeds when we have entered our protest against the historic creeds. All creeds, the shortest as well as the longest, the verbally scriptural as well as the "man-made" ones, are wrong when the emphasis is shifted from practical to intellectual and metaphysical eonsiderations. "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as LORD—thou shalt be saved."

The Middle-of-the-Road Minister.---II

S. S. Lappin

But to return to the man I am supposed to be introducing. The best I shall be able to do in presenting before you the Middle-of-the-road Minister is to let you see him from various angles as it has been my good fortune to see him here and there busy at the work of his choice.

The Middle-of-the-road Minister is a man of single purpose. He has interest in many of the activities of life, but with Paul, he is able to say "This one thing I do." He has views on many present day topics no doubt and these he will not shun to make known at proper time and place, but when it comes to the chosen work of his life, opinion must give place to conviction. Perhaps, if he would unbosom, he has doubts enough to get himself booted into prominence, but the dominant note of his message is faith and not fear.

The Middle-of-the-road Minister has no contentions with his brethren. Broad-gauge scholar and one-book evangelist sit, welcome guests, at his fireside. He loves them both for their real worth and will not discount either because of any opinion or acquirement, superficial or otherwise they are known to possess. The lines of the Goldsmith with slight adjustments fit him well:

"The old-time gospel preacher is his guest
Whose sun descending paints the golden west;
The erstwhile critic, now no longer proud,
Claims friendship there and has his claims allowed.
The bland solicitor, kindly bade to stay
Sits by his fire and talks the night away;
Takes his subscription, which victory won,
Runs down the list to show what others have done;
Pleased with his guest the good man does his part
To warm their heads beside his glowing heart."

The Middle-of-the-road man is not critical of science or scientists as such. He is past that and above it. Not being a specialist in these things he leaves confident speech concerning them to those who are. He has learned that first deductions are liable to such changes as that they will bear small resemblance to their former selves so he smiles good-humoredly at each frightful man of straw and bides his time. He is confident that trim and comely untimate truth will be well suited to his purposes. He believes in the unity and affinity of all truth. The gem which finally falls in the hand of science will, he believes but add its luster to the coronal of truths revealed in God's word. In this faith he welcomes all knowledge and gladly adds what he can to his little store—one sole condition being rigidly observed—that it first be proved to be knowledge.

The Middle-of-the-road minister is not narrow, which is to say he is not sectarian in his religious attitude. He is glad to recognize all that is good and true in the faith and life of those who differ from him. This he does with grace and taet without giving indorsement to one whit of the error they hold. He can be a light to others less liberal in their outlook because he has learned of the Lord how to differ and be decent. He believes in the union of God's people and seeks to bring it about but in no spirit of superiority. He respects the creeds of the past to such a degree that he would lift no standard above them save the living Christ himself. Of the names worn by others he has no light word to speak; he but urges that all men answer to the name that is above every name. He preaches the fundamental prineiples of the gospel as sometimes set forth in the familiar formula "Faith, Repentance and Baptism." But, important as these are, he but allows them to stand as the initial letters of a holy life. Faith must stand for Faithfulness, Repentance must come to mean Penitence and Baptism must be spelled out into Obedience to the Lord in all things.

The Middle-of-the-road man is no enemy of criticism if it be careful and reverent. He does not leave it to shiver outside his study door warming himself meanwhile over the coals of his own self-sufficiency. Nor does he greet it with superfluous effusion, the ready embrace and the kiss of complete surrender. His greeting to all comers is cordial, but he scans each face with careful scrutiny that no fraud be perpetrated, and if the countenance be frank and ingenuous he makes the highest learning welcome at his fireside and bids it say on. He will not make it the man of his counsel for he knows with what heedless enthusiasm men pursue a favorite theme and ohw error, white-robed, can seem the very counterpart of truth. What criticism has to say is heard by the wise and studious preacher, but when its say is heard assured results must pass muster before his own humble judgment and stand comparison with known truth as a final test. To him criticism is not a chronometer constantly at hand and by [illegible] but a barometer helpful at times, though not infallible and hung up somewhere around to be consulted occasionally along with other [illegible] that may help him to guess more accurately at things not yet settled. Thus regarding it he neither fears, fawns nor flinches in the presence of criticism, but pays it due honor, takes any real benefit it may be able to confer and goes on about his business.

The middle-of-the-road minister is the true cosmopolitan. First of all he is the Lord's minister in and to his community. Because he is this first of all he becomes many other things to his people. His attention is not wholly absorbed by a limited parish. He does good to all men, but especially to them that are of the household of faith. The only limitation set on his ministry is the willingness of the people to profit by it. If he joins a lodge it is that he may lead others into a larger and better fraternity—he belongs to the brotherhood of man. If he lends support to a political movement it is that he may prepare the way of the Lord and make his paths straight. His work is to save man and this he goes about in the only infallible way, by an appeal to the spirit through the preached word of God. Partial reforms are important to him only as they are related to the vital and final reform that triumphs in the soul of man. Others work on patiently at parts of the structure—he is brother to the architect and sees the whole plan without losing sight of its parts. Others are content to do picket duty or fight along the skirmish line. He is the Captain's aid and understands the plan of campaign. Friend of the helpless and outcast, advocate of the defenseless and champion of the weak he wins and holds the respect of all. In his life better than any other are fulfilled the words of the Master "Let him that will be great among you become the servant of all."

"Thus, to relieve the wretched is his pride,
And e'en his failings lean to virtue's side,
But in his duty, prompt at every call,
He watches, weeps, he prays and feels for all.
And as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
He tries each art, improves each dull delay
Allures to brighter worlds and leads the way."

Blessings on the Man-in-the-middle-of-the-road His is a lot to be deeply desired. Amid crash and clash he goes serenely on his way untouched and undisturbed. Others as brave but less discriminating have turned aside to give battle to pugnacious-looking wind mills, but he has gone on. Some of his fellows no more loyal have shed their blood in defense of unimportant outposts, he has fought only when the citadel was attacked.. Not a few have faced martyrdom in behalf of favorite forms or treasured opinions, but his contention is ever for the faith once delivered to the saints.

And so he has gone on and will go on bearing his message to the unsaved and unsought; go on with becoming charity and unwavering faith; go on with busy hands and trusting heart; for he walks with God; and some glad day when they have traveled far together and the twilight gathers about them his companion will say, "Ah, we are nearer my home than yours now, come with me."

Troubling the Pool.

By J. H. Jowett.

The legend of the angel and the pool, which is recorded in the fifth chapter of John, and which the Revised Version has relegated to the dubious outskirts of the margin, provides a most happy symbol of frequent happenings in personal and national history. "The angel of the Lord went down at certain seasons into the pool, and troubled the water." The pool was troubled by a supernatural agency, and by the agitation it was converted into a minister of health and healing. The emblem has its reality in actual experience. The Divine is continually shaking up the human, redeeming it from forceless insipidity, preserving it from poisonous stagnancy, saving it from becoming the breeding-place of moral and spiritual miasma, and doing all this by the creation of a healthy and vitalizing unrest.

In the light of this suggestion we may gain the proper attitude for contemplating the phenomena of the prevailing disturbance and unrest. Grace not only works in the establishment of peace, but in the creation of convulsion. Grace not only implies the ministry of the dew, but also the ministry of the volcano. It broods in the quiet air, but al also "rides upon the storm." It "speaks peace," but it also sends swords. It has its "still waters," but it has also its rolling torrents, scooping out new channels and deepening and broadening the old river-beds. There is a divine unrest, divinely begotten and divinely inspired, a holy restlessness which is the breeding-ground of moral virtues and the invigorating minister of spiritual health. There is a ferment in human affairs which is due to the divine yeast, and it is our wisdom to recognize the Divine impulsion which lies behind the apparently blind goings. and to base all our reasonings upon this great primary assumption. "It is the Lord." We often pray, "Lay Thy hand upon us for good." What if the gracious answer should come, not in a soft and soothing caress, but in a grip and a shake that will affect our circumstances like the turn of a kaleidoscope, and the whole contour of our life shall be changed? "By terrible things wilt Thou answer us, O God of our salvation!"

The same teaching is presented to us from a negative point of view. There is always a grave peril when the "troubling" in human life is long delayed. "Because they have no changes they fear not God." The truth of this word is confirmed in common experience. Unbroken health is not without its dangers. Men who live in the fierce glare of unbroken prosperity are apt to become hard and proud, and to stalk along in a perilous self-confidence which easily swells into self-conceit. As it is with individuals, so also is it with peoples. Nations which pass through unbroken periods of untroubled life are very prone to become morally degenerate. That is a striking figure by which the prophet describes the moral condition of his people: "He hath settled on his lees." The prophet take his figure from the practice of his countrymen of pouring a liquid from one vessel to another and thence into another, leaving behind, at each successive pouring, some of the lees, the dregs, the sediment, until at length the liquid is perfectly pure and transparent. And here is the application of the figure. When the life of a people is kept in motion, when it is poured from one set of circumstances into another, the disturbance is a minister of purification and transparency, and she gets rid of her moral filth. But this is the warning of the prophet: changeless circumstances may be a minister of moral ruin. "He hath settled on his lees!" He was quite contented to retain the moral sediment, to have it in close and intimate communion with his life, and by its presence to be defiled. When peoples are untroubled they come to terms with their filth. The passion for reform is not born in "the garish day," but in the shock of troubled circumstances, in the dull, grey season of disappointment and defeat.

And what will happen when the Lord shakes and troubles a people? First of all, we shall get rid of many things that are rotten. After a fierce tempest the roads are littered with the branches of trees. There is nothing like a high wind for fetching off the dead wood. Let the tree be well shaken, and the rotten and decrepit will drop away. It is so in the personal life. When our circumstances are convulsed, and life is troubled with the great shaking, we drop many a piece of rotten wood, and those who have most to do with us can see that the trees of our life are healthier after the storm.

And then, in the second place, when a people is shaken, the real essentials are revealed. A friend told me that when the boat on which he was sailing was in peril of engulfment, and a great crisis arose, it was amazing how all ecclesiastical differences were lost in a common oneness of simple and earnest communion with God. When the voyage was a strainless picnic, sectarianisms were obtrusive, when the voyage became a crisis, sects were submerged. And the experience has its analogy in the moral life of the state. Once again our land is being convulsed, our national life is being shaken, a great moral crisis is at our doors, and already the essentials are emerging like peaks which have long been hidden by earth-born mist and cloud. We are re-discovering the essentials, and in the essentials the once divergent companies are finding common armour, common inspiration, common bread.

And, lastly, when the Lord troubles our circumstances it is quite easy to discriminate between the weakling and the robust. These crises are our tests and they pronounce our judgment. "From that time many of his disciples turned back, and walked no more with Him." At what hour did they turn back? When they caught sight of Calvary and of possible loss and crucifixion. Aye, that is the time of test, when the lions are on the road! It is in the shaking that we discover the things that cannot be shaken. "What went ye out for to see? A reed shaken with the wind?" A reed bending before the blast? Yes, the bending reed shall be revealed. "But what went ye out for to see? A prophet?" Yea, and in the tempestuous wind he too shall be revealed, and he shall stand like a cedar of Lebanon.—The Christian World.

Love requires the most costly sacrifices of life, but makes them life's chief and keenest joys.

Instead of making ourselves perfect and others happy, we are always turning the idea wrong side out, trying to make others perfect and ourselves happy. The scheme won't work.

Lesson VII. General Features of the New Testament.

H. L. Willett

The purpose of the Gospels is declared by John to be "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing, ye may have life in his name" (Jno. 20: 31). In other words, it is to set forth the Gospel of Christ.

The Gospel is the "good news" of God's love for man as revealed in Jesus, and of the possibility of adjusting man's life to God through conformity to the teachings and spirit of our Lord.

The public ministry of Jesus probably extended through a period of more than three years. There was a time of obscurity, a time of popularity and a time of opposition, culminating in his crucifixion. During all this time Jesus was engaged in teaching, preaching and healing.

Jesus taught the disciples and the multitude; but to the former, as students in his school, his future apostles, he gave particular attention. The themes on which he taught included the nature of God, the kingdom of God, Jesus' own person and purposes, the greatness and the peril of man, sin and its consequences, the relation of the Gospel to the Law, and the program of Christianity.

Jesus preached to the people, announcing the advent of the kingdom of God and persuading men to accept its obligations. By this means he not only secured present results, but trained the disciples for their future work.

Jesus healed men's physical infirmities. The objects of the miracles were (1) to attract attention to himself; (2) to reveal the divine love for men in acts of beneficence; (3) to present proofs of his divine mission; (4) to illustrate the redemptive powers of the kingdom.

The training of the twelve disciples was accomplished by all that Jesus did, teaching, preaching and healing. The confession of Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16: 16), proved the success of the method, for Peter spoke not for himself alone, but for the twelve.

Three representative confessions are presented in the New Testament. That of Peter (Matt. 16: 16) emphasizes the Messiahship and divine Sonship of Jesus; that of Paul (Rom. 10: 9) the necessity of acknowledging the Lordship of Jesus and of belief in the resurrection; that of John (1 Jno. 4:2) the reality of Jesus' earthly life, which was in danger of denial. These statements combined, reveal the amplitude of the apostolic confession, as including the Messiahship, Sonship and Lordship of Jesus, his perfect divinity and perfect humanity.

Near the close of Jesus' ministry he delivered to the apostles his Great Commission, directing them to carry his Gospel into all the world and setting forth its terms. This Commission is given in each of the Gospels, though in varying words. (Matt. 28:18-20; Mk. 16:15, 16: Lu. 24:46-49; Jno. 20:21-23; Acts 1:8.)

Jesus commanded his followers to go into all the world and preach his message to all people; to announce the necessity of faith in himself and of repentance from life of sin; to baptize penitent believers into the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit; to teach them the observance of the Master's commandments and to assure them of pardon, the continued presence of the Lord with them, and their ultimate salvation.

The Book of Acts records the carrying out of the great commission by the apostles. It describes several examples of conversion in detail: (1) The Jews at Pentecost (chapter 2); (2) The Samaritans (chapter 8); (3) The Ethiopian (chapter 8); (4) Saul (chapter 9); (5) Cornelius the Gentile and his household (chapter 10); (6) Lydia (chapter 16); (7) The jailer at Philippi (chapter 16); Crispus and others at Corinth (chapter 18).

The most important events mentioned in the New Testament are: (1) The birth of Jesus; (2) his baptism and temptation; (3) the selection of the twelve apostles; (4) the confession of Peter; (5) the transfiguration; (6) the triumphal entry; (7) the trial and crucifixion; (8) the resurrection; (9) the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2); (10) the death of Stephen (Acts 7); (11) the conversion of Paul (Acts 9); (12) the first Gentile converts (Acts 10); (13) Paul and Barnabus sent forth as missionaries (Acts 13); (14) the consultation at Jerusalem (Acts 15); (15) Paul's arrest (Acts 21); (16) Paul's journey to Rome and ministry there (Acts 27-28).

Among the most important portions of the New Testament are the following: (1) The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7); (2) The Seven Parables (Matt. 13); (3) the Good Samaritan (Luke 10); (4) the Prodigal Son (Luke 15); (5) the Comfort Chapter (John 14); (6) the Prayer of the Lord (John 17); (7) the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2); (8) the Conquerors (Rom. 8); (9) Christian Living (Rom. 12); (10) the Psalm of Love (1 Cor. 13); (11) the Unities (Eph. 4); (12) the Glories of Faith (Heb. 11); (13) Christian Addition (2 Pet. 1); (14) the Sons of God (1 Jno. 3); (15) the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21-22).

THE NICKEL MAN.

Yesterday he wore a rose on the lapel of his coat, and when the plate was passed he gave a nickel to the Lord. He had several bills in his pocket and sundry change, perhaps a dollar's worth, but he hunted about, and, finding this poor little nickel, he laid it on the plate to aid the church militant in its fight against the world, the flesh, the devil.

His silk hat was beneath the seat, and his gloves and cane were beside it, and the nickel was on the plate—a whole nickel. On Saturday afternoon he had a gin rickey at the Queens, and his friend had a fancy drink, while the cash register stamped thirty-five cents on the slip the boy presented to him. Peeling off a bill, he handed it to the lad, and gave him a A nickel for the Lord and a nickel for nickel when he brought back the change. the waiter!

And the man had his shoes polished on a Saturday afternoon and handed out a dime without a murmur. He had a shave and paid fifteen cents with equal alacrity. He took a box of candies home to his wife, and paid forty cents for it, and the box was tied with a dainty bit of ribbon. Yes, and he also gave a nickel to the Lord! Who is the Lord? Who is he? Why, the man worships him as the creator of the universe, the one who put the stars in order, and by whose immutable decree the heavens stand. Yes, he does, and he dropped a nickel in to support the church militant.

And what is the church militant? The church militant is the church triumphant of the great God the man gave the nickel to.

And the man knew that he was but an atom in space, and he knew the Almighty was without limitations, and, knowing this, he put his hand in his pocket and picked out the nickel and gave it to the Lord. And the Lord being gracious and slow to anger, and knowing our frame did not slay the man for the meanness of his offering, but gives him this day his daily bread.

But the nickel was ashamed, if the man wasn't. The nickel did hide beneath a quarter that was given by a poor woman who washed for a living.—Toronto Star.

As has been pointed out more than once in this past six months of study in the Fourth Gospel, the first half of the book (Chapters 1-12) is taken up with a twofold work by our Lord, the development of faith in those who would accept Him and the manifestation of disbelief and hostility on the part of those who rejected Him. Jesus came to show to the world that every man has a capacity for faith in God and in all God's revelations to the world. "To each man God hath dealt a measure of faith;" not of belief, but of power to believe or, as Professor James calls it, "the will to believe."

The Will to Disbelieve.

But every man has also the power to put from him all the proofs of the divine presence in the world and to take the attitude of hostility to God's messengers. It is a part of the program of the Kingdom of God to bring such natures and forces to their full self-manifestation that both faith and unfaith shall be revealed. This was the direct result of Jesus' life. Men could not remain neutral toward Him. Nor can they to-day. Either deliberately or without set purpose all men who know of His plans take sides with or against Him. And even those who think they are not ready to decide the matter yet, but expect to do so at some time are already deciding it by their attitude, just as those who did not follow Christ were counted against Him. It had been said by Simeon at the dedication of Jesus in the temple that "this child is sent for the fall and the rising of many in Israel, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." Such is still and evermore the work of Christ to call to Himself those who will become the sheep of his flock, so that those who follow not may be known.

The Training of the Twelve.

The second part of the Fourth Gospel shows the method of Jesus in the intimate and personal training of the Twelve, after the public work was over, and when He knew that His hour was near. As the time went on, He turned more and more from the outer world to speak his words in the ears of the disciples alone. For this reason, as well as to find rest and safety for Himself He withdrew with the little company into remoter regions and there laid on their hearts the sanctions of that ministry He was so soon to leave wholly to them. They were not able as yet to bear the news that He was going away. Much less could they feel strong enough to face alone the difficult task in which even the Master was seemingly to fail.

The lessons of this quarter are devoted to this Inner Ministry, even as those of the first quarter dealt with the Outer. Even where the outer world of hostility and misapprehension obtrudes itself for a time, as in the lessons on the betrayal, the crucifixion and the burial, the touch of the world is revealed only that we may note the re-action of such events upon the disciples. We are always, like the Lord, watching them, and noting the growth of their faith in the Son of God. With the first lesson of the quarter, although it is taken from the earlier portion of the book, we see Jesus turning from the critical and suspicious groups of "Jews" (note the hostile character of that word in the Fourth Gospel) to the more intimate and friendly circle of the disciples. The false leaders, who seek to control only for their own advantage are contrasted with the Good Shepherd, who gives His life for the sheep.

In the scene at Bethany, when Lazarus is raised, the reader dimly recognizes the presence of the crowds, friends, citizens of the town and other Jews from Jerusalem. But the attention is wholly fixed upon the central figures, Jesus, Martha and Mary, and at last upon the restored brother, for whom Jesus has not only the love that brings him from Galilee to call him back, but the loving sympathy that cares for his comfort in the moment of his revival, and says to the astonished and inactive bystanders, "Loose him, and let him go." In the same town a little later occurred the touching incident which showed with what uncalculating love these friends of Jesus wanted to show their feeling for Him. Mary's gift was all the more precious to the Lord because it was so quickly gone. Nothing remained but the sweet odor to remind Him of the sacrifice it had cost. We always appreciate a gift in proportion to its value and its perishableness. That is why a rose is always prized more than a more enduring and even more costy gift. It speaks its mute message of love and cannot last to keep reminding the receiver of the obligation which it might imply.

The Upper Room.

After the Easter lesson came three in close connection, and all related to the last interview in the upper room. The singularly impressive act of washing the disciples' feet, which so shocked and solemnized them, was followed, as were all the significant acts of Jesus' life as related in this Gospel, with the message on humility which these ambitious men were so slow to learn, and which they so much needed. Then in the fifth lesson comes the great Comfort Chapter, with its beautiful and inspiring words, "Let not your heart be troubled." The Vine Chapter (15) is not included in the lessons, but in the sixth study the mission of the Holy Spirit is described, and His presence promised to the believers.

The Cross.

Then came two lessons in which the hostility of the world reached its climax. Jesus saw from the first that the issue would be joined soon or late, and He met it in the most astonishing way any crisis has ever been faced. Instead of resisting as He well might have done, He bowed His head and let the wave of shame and suffering go over Him. Friends and foes alike marvelled at His conduct. Why did he not resist, fight, protest? He took the surer way of triumph. He accepted defeat that He might make forever infamous the sins that brought Him to His death and that He might show all men that the way of defeat is often the only path to victory. If He had triumphed in any other way it would have been only as the world triumphs. In his victory he showed how all men may pass through suffering to joy. The cross is, therefore, no mere symbol, nor pious decoration. It is the secret of power and of victory. The instrument of cruel death has become the honored token of the faith that overcomes.

The Resurrection.

The three lessons, nine to eleven, deal with that mysterious, yet glorious period of Jesus' resurrection life. The wandering and heart-broken Mary at the tomb, the astonished two disciples, breathless in their haste to know the truth, the ten in the upper room, the second interview when Thomas made his glad surrender to the facts, and the closing scene, the precious postlude of a great hymn of faith are all the delight and the comfort of the student of holy things. How brief is the record. How much was left untold that we should like to know. Yet a few things we have, and they are enough. There will be time to learn the rest "in the house not made with hands." These few we have and we know their worth, for, they "are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God and that, believing, ye may have life in His name."

PALESTINE TRAVEL STUDY CLASS.

It is the custom of the University of Chicago to send out a class of students to Egypt, Palestine and Asia Minor every two years under the direction of some member of the biblical faculty. The first class went out six years ago under the leadership of Professor Mathews. Professor Willett took out the second and third classes in 1904 and 1907. Prof. Ira M. Price is to conduct the class next winter, starting about February 10. A full course of reading in preparation for the trip is provided. A circular containing full particulars regarding the trip, dates, itinerary and expenses will be sent upon application to Professor Price, the University of Chicago. An early registration will be advisable, both because of the desirability of completing the peliminary reading before the journey begins, and because the class is limited to twenty-five. The business management is in the capable hands of H. W. Dunning & Co., of Boston, who had charge of the former classes. A trip like this, with daily instruction in biblical history, geography and archeaology is one of the best of aids in the life of a preacher or Sunday School teacher.

Modern progress can accomplish most things, but it never will be able to substitute an elevator for the ladder of fame.—Price

The Prayer Meeting--The Victory of Faith.

Topic for June 24. Heb. 3:19; 4:6.

Silas Jones

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty;
And he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."

"Execute true judgment, and show kindness and compassion every man to his brother; and oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, the sojourner, nor the poor; and let none of you devise evil against his brother in your heart." The victory of faith, according to these Scriptures, is self-discipline, on the one hand, and on the other justice and kindness. Faith in God that does not bring health of body, mind and heart is not faith at all. Furthermore, the man whose personal habits are above reproach but who says that religion should not be mixed with business and politics, should be informed that he has no basis in Scripture for calling himself a man of faith. The disciple of Jesus Christ is in the work to see that justice is done and when any man thinks he can be unjust and wink at injustice in others and still be a good Christian, he is either an ignoramus or he is a knave. Our faith must sustain us in the contention for civic righteousness or else it will be brought into well merited contempt.

The Sin of Esau.

Esau is called in Scripture a profane person. And why? Because he had not faith. He said: "Behold, I am about to die; and what profit shall the birthright do to me?" There is your unbeliever. He mortgages the future for the gratification of the moment. He has nothing for which he will suffer. The man of faith has his land of promise toward which he is journeying. It may be far to it and the way may be difficult and dangerous. But he is determined. He will give up life itself before he will turn back upon his way. To the many suggestions that he is foolish for attempting a task so arduous he replies that he is a man and not a brute and therefore he finds his satisfaction in struggle rather than in undisturbed ease. He would live in the spiritual world and enjoy the society of the saints and fellowship with God. In order to live in this world, he must overcome the temptation to bound his life by the present moment. Unbelief furnishes no motive strong enough to withstand the assaults of appetite and passion. Faith in God as he is revealed in Christ supplies the needed motive. They who trust in God are unmoved though the earth do change and the mountains be shaken into the heart of the seas.

The Sin of Ahab.

Ahab desired the vineyard of his neighbor. Naboth would not sell the inheritance of his fathers. The law was on the side of Naboth. But the king got the vineyard in spite of the law and the right in the case. It is the work of faith to create reverence for the rights of others. A distinguished Jewish Rabbi said recently that a man without religion is a wolf. He lives upon the flesh of his brothers. He is therefore worse than a wolf. The old savagery of the forest survives in modern life. The methods of Ahab are still popular. If the church of today has faith, it will stand forth and condemn the piracy that wears the cloak of business. She is ready enough to denounce the sins of individuals. She must we a sready to declare unto society its sin and its transgression. Organized villany is the sin of to-day. The conscience of the church should be aroused against the destruction of human life and happiness by combinations of men who plead as their excuse the demands of business. Faith that considers only the sins of the ante-deluvians is not worth much. Faith that sees the coming of better conditions for the oppressed of this day is what we need. It is profitable for the life that now is and for that which is to come.

Christian Endeavor--Getting and Keeping a Situation.

Topic for June 21, Gen. 39:1-6; 41:38-44.

Royal L. Handley

The Christian Endeavor movement is true to its purpose whenever it is practical. In nothing could it be more so than in seeking to enlist Christian young people in the host of the world's men and women who are capable and efficient in life's labors. For he is a loyal disciple of Christ who seeks to do well the thing in hand.

Mr. Henry Van Dyke points out in his little poem, "Where the Master is Found," the Christian spirit in earnest, honest toil. He makes the Master Toiler say:

"Never in a costly palace did I rest on golden bed;
Never in a hermit's cavern have I eaten idle bread.
Born within the stable where the cattle round me stood,
Trained a carpenter in Nazareth I have toiled and found it good.
They who tread the path of labor follow where my feet have trod.
They who work without complaining do the holy will of God."

Getting a good position is not so much a question as that of efficiently filling the place when secured "Aye, there's the rub" for most of us.

The first essential is the appreciation of fitness or lack of it for the particular work. Add to this that amount of self-confidence which makes readiness for new responsibilities and many difficulties may be easily overcome. Success comes too, as the result of readiness, on the one hand, to take instruction and obey orders, and, on the other, that initiative which tends to do away with the necessity for specific direction in work. There is much virtue, too, in the old-fashioned habit of being faithful, the thing that comes from a high conception of duty. And this is the lesson learned well by the Endeavorer, who is true to his following of the great Master Workman.

PREPARATION.

By A. J. Shartle, in C. E. World.

In whatever walks of life we seek a situation, let us always be sure that we are thoroughly prepared to meet the requirements necessary to keep it. In this struggle for "the survival of the fittest," no matter how responsible the position, whether found at the bottom or top rung of the ladder of ambition, the best qualifications for success are honesty, sobriety, industry, and faith—faith in self, faith in your employer; faith in your work; faith in your fellow men; above all, faith in God.

With these qualifications as pillars upon which to continue day by day the building up of Christian character, and a consecrated effort to make each succeeding day better and more profitable to our employer, and to do his will as long as it is consistent with Christian principles, there is no reason why, unless for special reasons over which we may have no control, we should not succeed in getting a situation and keeping it, with the determination to persevere as recently defined by a colored brother when he said, "Perseverance means, firstly, to take hold; secondly, to hold on; thirdly, to nebber let go." The person who possesses these qualities is bound to be successful in any business.

Col. John Boyd, when assistant doorkeeper for the House of Representatives in 1871, one day heard a man say to another assistant, "I am very anxious to find Senator Sargent of California." The assistant replied that it was not his business to find senators. Mr. Boyd stepped up and offered to find the senator, as a matter of courtesy. Gratified, the stranger handed Mr. Boyd a card, and requested him to meet him that evening. The card bore the name of Collis P. Huntington, the great railroad builder. That evening he secured a position paying almost double the salary he had been getting.—Saturday Evening Post.

There have been 380 additions, and the offerings for missions and for current expenses have greatly increased. In the Sunday School, especially, the faithful labors of the pastor and his cultured wife have been fruitful. The school has been reorganized with departmental divisions, each having a superintendent. It has been thoroughly graded, and constructive Bible studies introduced. The church has appointed a pulpit committee to secure a successor to Mr. Burns.

The sad news of the death of E. M. Gordon reached the office of the Foreign Society June 3d. He had recently returned from India, on his regular furlough. He died at Hopkinsville, Ky., where he was visiting the church which so loyally supported him as their Living-Link. He was supposed to be in good health. His death was very sudden and the news came as a great shock. The particulars are not yet known. He leaves a wife and one little girl, who are at present in Philadelphia, Pa. They will have the prayers of thousands of loyal, loving friends. Mr. Gordon was born in India, united with our people in that land and has been in the service of the Foreign Society since 1891. His death is one of the greatest losses the society has ever sustained.

A GREAT CHILDREN'S DAY.

All the signs point to a remarkably successful Children's Day for Heathen Missions. There has never been such a demand for supplies. Already about four thousand Sunday schools have ordered them and a large number of orders continue to arrive daily. The number of requests exceed those of last year by more than 500. We have never before witnessed such an uprising. The Teachers' Training campaign has helped mightily as a leavening and as an inspirational influence.

The apportionment for the schools have been most cordially received and more Experience of a Southern Man.

"Please allow me to thank the originator of Postum which in my case speaks for itself," writes a Florida man.

"I formerly drank so much coffee during the day that my nervous system was almost a wreck. My physician told me to quit drinking it but I had to have something to drink, so I tried Postum.

"To my great surprise I saw quite a change in my nerves in about ten days. That was a year ago and now my nerves are steady and I don't have those bilious sick headaches which I regularly had while drinking coffee.

"Postum seems to have body-building properties and leaves the head clear. And I do not have the bad taste in my mouth when I get up mornings. When Postum is boiled good and strong, it is far better in taste than coffee. My advice to coffee drinkers is to try Postum and be convinced." "There's a Reason."

promptly approved than at any time in the past. A request to lower the apportionment is the exception. The enthusiasm has already reached a high tide and seems to grow daily. We shall not be surprised to see the number of contributing schools pass the four thousand mark and the contributions touch close to $100,000. The very mention of this great advance stirs all Christian hearts.

Let the whole month of June be devoted to this splendid campaign, which has been so well begun. The needs of the work are great and growing in urgency daily. A united, loyal, consecrated people can accomplish marvelous things. These are the days of our opportunity. Let no man halt or hesitate in this hour of unparalelled awakening. GOD RULES. The old gospel of his grace still conquers the most stubborn paganism.

PEORIA (ILL.) BANQUET.

The church at Peoria gives an annual Fellowship banquet in May of each year. This year the pastor, Bro. Harry F. Burns, arranged to invite the members of the Calvary Baptist church and make it a union affair. They responded to the invitation in generous numbers and the banquet room was crowded. Dr. Theodore Soares of the University of Chicago, a Baptist, delivered the main address. It was a hearty appeal for union and received cordial applause from the banqueters, regardless of denominational line. Dr. Soares made two main points in his address, which sparkled with wit and good humor and neat satires on untenable positions in both bodies. The first was that we were embarrassed by our successes; that the distinct things for which most of the denominations came into existence were now the common heritage of all Christian bodies and thus the original reason for their existence had passed away. The second was that if either body gained anything over the other the union would be delusive and bring division within itself; that the union must come by a compulsion that would bring a natural harmony and leave no aftermath of glorying or regrets.

Bro. Burns is to be congratulated over the idea and the success in which it was carried out. The church at Peoria heard his resignation read last Lord's Day with regret. He leaves only because an opportunity presents itself at this time to pursue further studies in New York city. His work of three years has been very successful and he leaves the church harmonious and well organized.

THE HOOPESTON (ILL.) MEETING.

The great meeting at Hoopeston closed last Sunday with 327 additions. On the first of the year the pastor, Lewis R. Hotaling, seeing the possibilities of the field, began at once to cast about for a suitable evangelist to conduct a revival meeting. After much correspondenee with leading men in the field the choice finally fell on Wm. J. Lockhart, of DesMoines, Ia. The plan at first was to hold the meeting in the fall but on account of the postponed date with the $75,000 Christian church at Houston, Texas, Mr. Lockhart was constrained to spend that time in Hoopeston, that being the month of May.

The meeting began auspiciously on Rally Day, May 3d, with a large audience. Mr. Lockhart, together with his efficient singer, Mr. C. H. Altheide, was present and ready for service. His first duty was to raise a slight indebtedness of $575—$685 was the amount that was quickly raised. The first invitation was not given until May 7th when ten responded. Throughout the entire meeting the invitation was not given without additions.

From the beginning the audiences were surprisingly large. At many services scores were turned away, though the large auditorium comfortably seats 1,300 people. In a single service there were 46 additions. On a single Sunday there were 70 additions, another 55 and on another 42 additions.

Evangelist Wm. Lockhart is a young man, a graduate of Drake University, has a pleasing voice, nerves of high tension, is wonderfully alert and quick of motion. He always has control of his audiences, speaks rapidly and in a pleasing manner that is most unique and original, becoming at times quite dramatic. He has great ability in making his audiences feel individually "Thou art the man."

Mr. Lockhart has a rare combination of humor, tenderness and tact.

The Christian church in Hoopeston now has a membership of a trifle over 800 and is in a very prosperous condition. From here Mr. Altleide, the singer, goes to New Berlin, O., and the evangelist. Mr. Lockhart, goes to Grand Island, Neb.

LARGEST TRAINING CLASS IN NEBRASKA.

We graduated 77 in our Teachers' Training Class last Sunday evening. We had a program rendered in keeping with the occasion. An address on the subject, "The Bible, A Library," by the minister of the church and the diplomas were presented by the state superintendent of the Teachers' Training Class, Prof. W. R. Jackson. Prof. Jackson in his remarks stated that this was the largest class of graduates that the state of Nebraska would have and was very anxious to have a photograph of the class to take to the International convention.

This work has been in charge of J. Z. Briscoe, Mrs. M. E. King and Prof. Hilton. Mr. Briscoe's class had the number of graduates numbering forty-seven. Of these over twenty made a grade of 100 per cent. Mr. Briscoe is a man seventy years of age and has taught young people's classes for many years. All of these teachers did most excellent work. Bro. Hilton's class was taught during the mid-week for those who could not take it on Sunday. Mr. Clyde Cordner a student of Cotner University is our efficient superintendent. We hope to have many more graduates next year.

The natural elements of wheat and barley, including the phosphate of potash, are found in Grape-Nuts, and that is why persons who are run down from improper food pick up rapidly on Grape-Nuts.

"My system was run down by excessive night work," writes a New York man, "in spite of a liberal supply of ordinary food.

cially or otherwise are interested in Missionary education in the Sunday school for nine days of uninterrupted conference and prayer. The conference will endeavor to extend its ideals and plans by the training of missionary leaders and workers in local Sunday schools.

Officers of the various state and other Sunday School Associations, representatives of the Baraca and Philathea movements, superintendents of Sunday schools, members of Missionary commitees in local Sunday schools, teachers, young pastors, business men state superintendents and all others interested in the growth and development of Sunday school work should attend this conference.

It will be held at beautiful Silver Bay, on the west side of Lake George, twenty-two miles from the Southern end and eight miles from the northern end.

We have not been represented at these conferences as we should have been. We have an excellent opportunity of getting in touch with a movement which means incalculable help in the practice and permanent development of our Sunday school work.

OKLAHOMA CHRISTIAN UNIVERSITY.

Three commodious buildings are now fully completed, namely the Main Building Fine Arts Building and Ladies' Hall. These buildings have been described in previous articles, suffice it to say that we have one of the finest educational plant in the southwest. The main building is beautiful in appearance, commodious, modern in every particular. The Fine Arts Building is all that can be desired in its way and the Ladies' Hall is exceedingly well adapted to its purpose, and is a veritable home for young ladies.

A Successful Year.

We have just closed a successful school year. The total enrollment was about 260, notwithstanding the fact that we lost very heavily on account of the unfinished condition of the buildings in the beginning of the year. Fifty-four ministerial students enrolled, placing us fourth among the Disciples in ministerial attendance. The classroom work was thorough and our students are highly pleased with the advantages they have enjoyed.

The year closed with a convention running through three days celebrating the establishment of the institution. Our various missionary and benevolent associations were represented by competent speakers and the Ministerial Institute of Oklahoma also had a session each day.

In addition to the speakers from our own state we had with us J. H. Garrison, F. M. Rains, J. W. McGarvey, Graham Frank, J. H. Mohorter, O. N. Roth and P. M. Kendall. Several on the program were hindered from being present by washouts on the railroads in Oklahoma and Texas, which so seriously interfered with our attendance. However, we had a very good convention and everybody was delighted with the outlook for the school.

It was an universal expression that Oklahoma Christian University will have more to do with our cause in the southwest than any other agency. All seemed to feel that its importance to our work could not be over-estimated.

The Outlook.

The future of the school seems bright with promise. It is true that we have been somewhat embarrassed financially, owing to the fact that large sums of money due us have not been paid, but we have very positive assurance that the balance due us on bonus will be paid in the near future, and as soon as this is done, Judge J. N. Haymaker of Wichita, Kan., will take the field and raise the balance needed to liquidate all indebtedness. We hope to start out next year without any debt at all for either buildings or equipment.

Freeport, Ill., is a city 100 miles west of Chicago, a thriving manufacturing town and the third wealthiest city in the state.

Our cause here began about two years ago, being fathered by O. F. Jordan, then of Rockford, now located at Evanston, and C. A. Young. J. A. Barnett of Galesburg was the first pastor, serving until November 1, 1907. David Wolf of Lanark, gave the first $100 to establish the work, and has been helping in various ways ever since.

I came to the work November 1, and in seven months there has been a constant increase of strength. Some twenty-five accessions from various sources bring the local working strength up to fifty-six. The Bible school is in a growing, healthy condition. We have a beautiful and convenient place for our services in the Masonic Temple, on the principal street of the city, and right in the neighborhood of the best churches. The audiences are constantly increasing, especially on Sunday evening, sometimes taxing the capacity of the room.

What is perhaps the most notable event in our local history transpired on Monday night, June 1, when the public graduating exercises of the Christian Training School for Nurses took place. A class of five noble young women took their diplomas from the institution. This training school is conducted under the auspices of the National Christian Hospital and Sanitarium Association at the White Sanitarium. The largest factor in our work locally is the prestige and influence of this institution. The whole White family are Disciples from tne most loyal stock in our Brothrehood. The institution commands a large local patronage as well as a rapidly inereasing clientele from adjoining towns, and even states.

A large volume of eharity work is done by the institution. The opportunity for this is larger than it would otherwise be, because of the f aet that Dr. Robert White is the county physieian.

Bishop Fallows of Cnicago delivered the principal address at the graduation exercises and brought a live message He exposed on a sane and rational basis the fallacies of Christian Science and gave the panacea for the "Christianicus Scientiens" germ viz.: A eombination of Christian faith and apostolic practiee with the recognized medical truth and practice of today. A union of the gospel teaching and disease healing find preventing funetions not necessarily in the same person, but that the work of the preacher and healer be made co-ordinate.

O. F. Jordan delivered the diplomas to the elass in the absence of Dr. Willett, the honorary president of the board. It was my lot to appear in the role of prophet and tell what we expected to do in the future.

The affair was a very popular one as the audience room did not hold all the people who came.

So far as I know this is the first public graduation of nurses ever held under the auspices of our people in any way. We hope it is the beginning of great things in our brotherhood in all sections of the country.

I delivered the Decoration day address on invitation of the G. A. R. last Saturday which was well received, and on Sunday evening, June 14th, I am to preach the baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class of our high school.

We are planning to erect a building to be used in an institutional way and already have an option on suitable lots near the Sanitarium. The thing that is holding us up now is the effort to devise ways and means to secure the necessary funds.

The Martin family are planning to be wit us in August and we are hoping for great things from their work.

AMONG THE COLLEGES.

During the month of May, by invitation, I attended the Commencement exercises of three of our colleges as follows: Virginia Christian college, at Lynchburg, Va.; Wm. Woods college at Fulton, Mo., and Oklahoma Christian university, Enid, Okla.

Virginia Christian College has yet the dews of youth upon its garments. However, the institution has the promise of a long life and of a splendid and useful career. It will be remembered that only a short time ago the institution came in possession of a large building and more than fifty acres of land in the suburbs of Lynchburg, right at the end of the street car line. Only a nominal amount was paid for the land and buildings. The property has greatly enhanced in value. This was one of the wisest investments known to me. The past session has been a successful one indeed. The attendance was large and quite a number were graduated. President J. Hopwood and all associated with him are to be congratulated. The spirit of the institution is thoroughly Christian. Two buildings will be erected soon. They will meet an urgent need. For this purpose G. O. Davis, the financial man, has secured $50,000. Virginia Christian College is worthy of the prayers and patronage and financial aid of the brotherhood generally and especially of Virginia. It is destined to become an institution of great usefulness and far-reaching influence.

Sunday, May 24th. I preached the baccalaureate sermon at Wm. Woods College. The church at Fulton united with the faculty and students in the service and made up a great audience. Some seven years ago I visited this institution. Many improvements have been made in this brief time. Two splendid buildings have been erected and other much needed improvements in the equipment have been secured. President J. B. Jones is a wise manager and a splendid leader and educator who ranks with the best. All of his ideals are practical and thoroughly Christian. Dr. Wm. S. Woods, of Kansas City, for whom the institution was named, has stood by it with generous contributions. He has made possible its present splendid usefulness. This college is devoted exclusively to the education of young women. Many states are represented in the student body. The government is ideal and the beautiful Christian spirit pervading the whole institution would meet the demands of the most exacting. It is already a missionary center. One of the alumni is laboring on heathen soil and others are preparing for the service.

W. A. Fite, the minister of the Fulton church, spoke in the evening to the undergraduates. This was truly a timely and helpful address. His work for the church is telling for good in many directions. He is planning larger things for the church with every assurance of cordial approval and assured success.

From Fulton, I hastened away to Enid, Okla., where I was booked for two addresses during the week of the commencement exercises of the Oklahoma Christian University. The success of this institution is a wonder. In about one year, three new buildings have been erected on a large and beautiful campus at a cost of about $90,000. The number of students for the past session was more than two hundred, and of this number, fifty-four are preparing for the Christian ministry. President E. V. Zollars has been carrying a heavy load and has done it bravely and cheerfully. Our people in the young state of Oklahoma are extending loyal and even enthusiastic support to this new enterprise.

THE LUBEC MEETING.

No mistake was made in calling Mitchell and Bilby for our meeting. A meeting was planned for more than a year, but definite arrangements were effected only a few weeks before the meeting began. Our auditorium was too small. From the first it was not sufficient for our large audiences. The second Lord's Day evening we used the auditorium of the Christian Connection church, and although the largest church auditorium in town it was packed to the doors and many turned away. After two more nights of agony in our cramped quarters at home we were permitted the use of the Christian Connection auditorium for the next ten days for evening meetings. A great meeting was on. Nearly every service was crowded. The people were deeply stirred. The evangelistic meetings were the talk of the town. As the Christian Connection people were expecting a new minister the following Sunday, we had to vacate at the end of the ten days. To this time we had sixty converts. Many of our members were satisfied and wished to close the meeting with a home week in our own building. It was with no little difficulty that we were able to take the meeting to the opera house, where we continued for over three weeks with great success, our converts reaching the number of one hundred and fifty-four. Toward the close our work in the opera house was so interrupted by various functions as to greatly diminish results. The last few services were held in our own building with overflowing houses. Had we not been so cramped much of the time and cut to pieces by frequent interruptions and changes, the results might have been much greater. Aside from the above difficulties, and more or less connected with them were other difficulties harder to describe. It was not a union meeting. One church of the place had no minister, and we feared that such an offer would be construed as an attempt to take "undue advantage. In the interest of fairness and unselfishness a broad invitation was given. All who wished to obey Christ were urged to do so whether they united with the Christian Temple congregation or not. Soul saving was thus put first, as it should be, and even the appearance of selfishness, if it is selfish to work for members for the local church, was eliminated. This was more than fair to others; for while we paid for the meeting others were given the opportunity of profiting by it, and did profit by it, and might have profited yet more. I think this unselfish course had much to do with the success of our meeting, and that we increased the membership of our local church more than we would have done by any other course. Those who have gone or will go to other churches would not have come forward under other circumstances. And some are now members with us that could not otherwise have been reached. Our meeting was a great success. We have received letters and telegrams of congratulation declaring it the best meeting of our people ever held in New England, or anywhere, for that matter, considering the size and conservatism of the place.

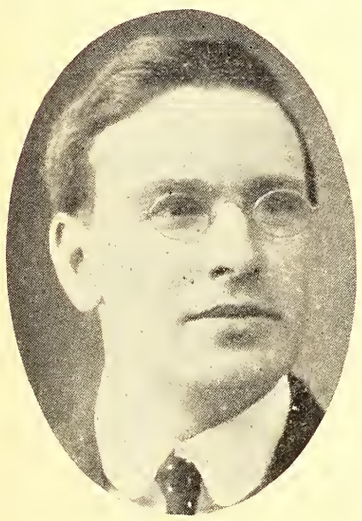
Of the 154 who came forward, 113 were confessions. 28 were renewals, and 13 were by letter or statement. Of the confessions, 89 were baptised, 85 of whom are now members with us. Of the renewals only 9 were from our own congregation, and 2 from an allied congregation; our increase of new members from renewals was 13, 11 of whom came from other religious bodies. Of these coming by letter or statement two only were from an allied congregation. Our increase of local membership to date is 109 here and 2 at South Lubec, 111 in all. Quite a number more will be added from those yet to be baptised.



F. J. M. Appleman.

The splendid results attained in spite of all difficulties encountered speak more for our evangelists than anything else I can say. They have won a signal victory in a most difficult field under most unfavorable circumstances. Mitchell's preaching is clear, strong, and convincing. He can make sin look exceedingly sinful, and presents the gospel of love in its most attractive form. He is discreet and tactful, a Christian gentleman of culture and consecration. He is a lecturer of no mean ability.

Prof. Bilby's solos are grand, and he directs the music like a master. His musical ability is recognized by the best musical talent in the town and has won for him great credit. He is also a cartoonist of merit. The audience sits "dead still" watching the development of his sketches under the skilful fingers. His concert was spoken of as the best ever given in Lubec.

To raise the necessary money was not found a difficult matter. Our offerings were good.

The meeting has more clearly demonstrated the incapacity of our building to meet the needs of the church if it is to grow and become the force in the town that it is capable of becoming. We have a fine building, built during the ministry of my predecessor, but it is too small both for church and Sunday school purposes. F. J. M. APPLEMAN.

The Lubec, Maine, meeting is said to be the largest ever held by our people in the "Pine Tree State," and one of the largest by our people in the New England belt of churches. There were over one hundred and fifty-four who responded to the invitation. I believe we could have doubled that number if we could have prosecuted the meeting from start to finish in a permanent place of sufficient seating capacity. We have a beautiful little church, due to the faithful ministry of Bro. Harry Minnick and the generosity of Bro. Staples, but it is too small for an evangelistic campaign of such proportions.

Bro. Appleman, the minister, belongs to the worthies who conquer by faith. He alone deserves most credit, for he got the church to see that a great meeting could be held in the far east, and during the entire meeting he stood resolute for big things. Any of our best churches could make no mistake in securing Bro. Appleman as its minister. He has an ideal minister's wife in Mrs. Appleman.

Bro. Bilby was at his best in leading of song, solo work, and cartoon production. He is an artist along all these lines.

The cause in Lubec has a great future if it is not handicaped by small faith. We made many friends whom we count among our choicest blessings.

Bro. Bilby and myself will be back in the states for our fall and winter engagements. At present we are in a fine meeting with Bro. Appelman in the leading city of N. B., Canada. Go next to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. Address us here, or at permanent address, Lima, Ohio, 217 East Kilby street.

MEN'S ORGANIZATIONS.

It is the purpose of the recently organized Christian Men's Union of Western Pennsylvania to encourage the organization of the men in every church of the Pittsburgh district. We are leaving each church free to follow the lines that seem best adapted to its own field, insisting only that Bible school and missionary activity shall be emphasized everywhere.

It will be a great help to our enterprises if every man's organization in the brotherhood will kindly forward to the President of our Union, Geo. W. Knapper, 835 Rebecca street, Wilkinsburg Staation, Pittsburgh, Pa., two copies of its Constitution and By-laws. Our literature will be sent in exchange.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net, postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Early Relations and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo. cloth, gold side and back stamp, $1.00. A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

You will never capture the whole moral resources of the gospel to drive what is mainly an economic program. The redistribution of the race's wealth and comfort can never engross a gospel whose task and victory are the regeneration of the race's soul. Christianity does not make man's happiness its first concern, but God's glory, in which alone man finds himself and his joy. Society, we all feel, must be slowly reorganized so as to provide scope for moral manhood. But we need something more than that. Society cannot create moral manhood, cannot provide the dynamic which demands the scope. And it is my religion that Christ can, and that Christ alone can.

HARD EARNED WAGES.

An old church in Belgium decided to repair its properties, and employed an artist to touch up a large painting. Upon presenting his bill, the committee in charge refused payment unless the details were specified, whereupon he presented the items as follows:

There is no man so happy as the Christian. When he looks up into heaven, he thinks, That is my home: the God that made it and owns it is my Father . . . . Nothing in earth or hell can make him miserable. There is nothing in the world worth envying but a Christian.—Joseph Hall.

GREAT WOMEN*

Tennyson has sung the song of Fair Women, and an earlier bard, Chaucer, recited the virtues of Good Women in the morning of English song; and there have been not a few who have undertaken to write the stories of Great Women from the days of Semeramis to those of Jane Addams. Our own age is notable for the number of women who have made history and are leaving their impress upon the nation and the world. It was but a short time since woman's place was that of an inferior. This was not always true. Early records give evidence that the first estate of woman was equal to, if not superior than man's The matriarchal system of government apparently preceded the patriarchal. In primitive times the man was the accidental and unimportant member of the family. The child inherited from the mother rather than from the father. Even in the Old Testament this social system had only just given place to that which reduced woman to a lower position.

The persistence of this inferior station for women has been long continued. It was one of the distinct shocks to the social order of the age when Christianity, following the example of its Founder, refused to hold woman in the lower place to which she had been assigned, and honored her with the friendship and confidence of the Apostles and the Lord Himself. The roll call of illustrious women in the New Testament is long and inspiring. Missionary history is full of the same honorable estimate of womanhood, but it has remained for our own age to open wide the doors of recognition and responsibility to these who were once regarded as members of the weaker and less capable sex.

At the University of Chicago last week there was dedicated a chime of ten bells in honor of the memory of Alice Freeman Palmer, the first dean of women of that institution. With impressive ceremonies these bells, ranging from tenor to treble, were set apart to their honored service. They are to be placed in Mitchell Tower, the commanding structure at the northeastern corner of the Quadrangles. They were cast by the celebrated London firm of Mears and Stainbank, the makers of nearly all the great bells and chimes, including "Great Ben" of Westminster, "Great Peter" of York Minster, "Great Tom" of Lincoln Cathedral, the great clock bells of St. Paul's Cathedral, and the Bow Bells of Cheapside, London. This is the fourteenth full set of chimes made by these noted bell-makers since the founding of their establishment in 1570.

The art of bell casting and of bell ringing is one of the hereditary crafts to which certain English families are devoted. These bells will sound the quarter hours with their chimes, and will also be played on special occasions from a keyboard. Professor Palmer, who holds the chair of Moral Philosophy in Harvard University, was present at the dedication of the chimes and voiced his appreciation of the honor done to the memory of his wife. He read the inscriptions on the ten bells, all of which were either taken from or suggested by Biblical texts. They were as follows: "A gracious woman retaining honor," "Easy to be entreated," "Always rejoicing, "Making the lame to walk and the blind to see," "Great in council and mighty in work," "Rooted and grounded in love," "Fervent in spirit." "Given to hospitality," "The sweetness of her lips increasing learning," "In God's law meditating day and night."

It is an interesting fact that almost simultaneously with the placing of these chimes in her memory, there has appeared her biography, written by her husband. It is a notable tribute to a great woman. Alice Freeman Palmer was one of the immortals. In the world of education and culture she had a foremost place. She opened the door of educational opportunity to women, through which so many of her sisters have passed during the generation spanned by her brief life.

She was born in 1855, and early became a teacher, manifesting great educational ability and enthusiasm. In spite of many difficulties, the result largely of burdens imposed upon her by duties to her parents, she rapidly took a leading place in the college world, and at the early age of twenty-seven, was appointed president of Wellesley College. She had a wonderful capacity for securing the friendship of her students. She never forgot faces or names. Prof. Palmer says, "Probably the ennobling atmosphere which seemed thus to radiate from her presence was in some measure connected with her religious faith. She believed that conscious fellowship with God is the foundation of every strong life, the natural source from which all must derive their power and their peace. Hers was a dedicated soul."

She was married to Prof. Palmer in 1887, after an acquaintance of three years. The story of their married life is told in very delightful and yet reverent fashion by her biographer. They spent three "sabbatical years" abroad in travel and study, at different times during the fifteen years of their married life. It was during the last of these three years, 1902, that she was stricken with the malady from which she died in Paris at the age of forty-seven. Prof. Palmer compels the reader to feel that the fullness of satisfaction flowing from the memory of her gracious presence and companionship forbids any note of grief, even at her early departure. There is a tone of serene and lofty joy in the entire work, which makes us understand that its author has performed a labor of love and devotion in the preparation of these pages.

Mrs. Palmer is a worthy figure in the high sisterhood of American women of light and leading. In her career as president of Wellesley and as dean of women at the University of Chicago, she did much to make education an expected and prized privilege in the lives of American women. Hers was not a public career: almost all her days were passed in the cloistered seclusion of academic halls. And yet her life has left an indelible impress upon the generation. The future will remember her long with Harriet Beecher Stowe, Julia Ward Howe, Francis Willard and Jane Addams.

MISCHIEF IN COMIC PICTURES.

A small boy of my acquaintance became highly interested, not long ago, in the adventures of a naughty youth presented in the comic supplement of a well-known newspaper. The youth in the newspaper shampooed his sister's hair and annointed the poodle with a mixture of ink, glue, and the family hair tonic, leaving the remainder of the compound in the bottle for the use of his father and mother. The results as pictorially set forth were so intensely amusing that the small observer immediately took steps to repeat them in real life. Much mischief is suggested in such ways as this, and the suggestions come from artists who have little sympathy with children—knowing them mainly as a theme to make jokes about.

Analyze the humor in the funny pictures of our newspapers, and you will find that in nine cases out of ten it rests upon somebody's misfortune—an apple-woman upset by an automobile, a sleeping tramp annoyed by small boys, an absent-minded old gentleman walking into a tank of water. Such are the subjects that are given to our children to make them laugh—while we are trying to teach them to be thoughtful of the comfort of others, genuinely polite, and considerate of every one.—Walter Taylor Field, in Fingerposts to Children's Reading (McClurg & Co.).

The Hittites in Asia Minor

Sir William M. Ramsay

Appearances indicate that the next important series of discoveries in ancient history will be made in the soil of Asia Minor. The answers to two pressing questions are coming soon to the surface. Who were the Children of Heth, from whom Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah, and one of whom was Uriah, to whom David behaved with such treacherous cruelty? Who were the sons of Javan (Genesis x. 4), who founded Tarshish and other cities of the north coast of the Levant, and who learned from and gave lessons to the races of Syria as early as the second millennium B. C.? These two peoples, the Hittites and the Ionians, stand on the borderland between east and west in that period; and now we are on the point of learning who and what they really were. The Hittites were known from the Old Testament, and from the Assyrian and Egyptian records. They were pushed north by the Hebrews, and westward by the Assyrians. They had fought against Rameses, the Pharoah who oppressed the Hebrews fourteen centuries B. C., and the story of that war, and of the peace which concluded it, was familiar to us from the Egyptian records. But these facts seemed only to point to a Syrian people, and gave no ground to connect it with Asia Minor; and the people itself seemed at one tme to have disappeared, leaving no trace of their life and institutions, except in so far as they had come into relations with Egyptian and Mesopotamian civilization; and this might and did suggest that they were a rude and barbarous race who had no records of their own. About 1870, the late Dr. Wright advanced the hypothesis that certrain hieroglyphics found at Hamath and elsewhere in north Syria belonged to the Hittites, who thus acquired at last historical ground to stand on, at least in vague and undeciphered theory.

It was in the year 1879 that Professor Sayce discovered the Hittites in Asia Minor. Judging from a few short hieroglyphic inscriptions carved on the rocks in several parts of the country, showing the same symbols as had been found at Hamath in Syria, he boldly leaped to the conclusion that the same people had cut those inscriptions in such diverse regions, and that a uniform civilization, religion and government had prevailed from Smyrna and the Aegean coast right away down to the borders of Egypt. Inscriptions proved civilization. The characters were similar, and utterly diverse from the writing of Mesopotamia and of Egypt. The Hittites alone had any claim to them.

Controversy raged round this daring generalization. Many were unwilling to accept a new empire and civilization on such slight evidence. Sayce's morthodox views about Herodotus and Homer added fierceness to the fires of controversy. There were a hundred good reasons to allege against him. The one reason in his favor was that he was right; and long time has elapsed before the truth was discovered. In 1882 Sir C. Wilson and I found a great Hittite inscription and many small ones at Boghaz-Keni in northern Cappadocia; and I published an argument in 1883 (developed more fully later) that there must have been some great empire, with a capital at Boghaz-Keni, and roads radiating from it west to Smyrna, and east and south to Syria. Afterward, in the prefaee to "Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia," I argued that the Hittite hieroglyphics must have originated on the open plateau of central Asia Minor, in the great state whose capital was at Boghaz-Keni. The complete proof could come only from the excavation of this capital, and that was expensive; but I had this enterprise always before me as a dream for the future. Now the proof has come. The German scholar Winckler began to dig at Boghaz-Keni in May, 1906. He has found more than 2,000 cuneiform inscriptions, many of the Tel-el-Amarua period and style, many in a language which must be Hittite. He has found the names of all the Hittite kings who came into relations with Egypt, and a copy of the treaty between the Hittites and Rameses, written in cuneiform (like the Tel-el-Aamarua documents). The proof is now complete. The first controversy is ended -- the great war, which the witty Irish scholar described in 1880 by saying that the world was divided between the Jebusites and the Hittites, because the opposing leaders were Professors Jebb and Sayce, has now been settled by a peace, and the armies of scholars are prepared to enter on new wars.

The University of Aberdeen has had an honorable place in this discussion. Many of the most important Hittite monuments were discovered by its graduates and scholars. To enable the university to continue to hold its foremost position, it must use the spade as well as simply send out a traveler and epigraphist. For discovery in history there are needed not merely learning, brains and courage, but also money. The minimum on which systematic work could be planned for the future was £500 a year, for, say, five years. The situation was stated to the chancellor of the university, Lord Strathcona, and he at once replied that he would give this sum, and start us fairly on the path of discovery. I went to him hoping to get a beginning, which might encourage us to appeal to others to help; half an hour later I was writing to Constantinople to request permission from the Imperial Government to make excavations on an important Hittite site. The capital city has been taken up by the Germans, to whom we wish all good fortune; but there are several other important cities, on one of which we hope soon to begin; but government in Turkey moves slowly, and some patience is needed before the spade can be put in the ground, and meanwhile there is much room for further exploration on the surface, which in any case will be carried on concurrently with excavation on a systematic plan. It has never, previously, been in my power to make any sytematic plans. Each year might be the last of travel, and one seized the most pressing chances, letting slip the rest. For the last few years I have definitely declared each summer that this was the last journey, and that the financial strain was too great. Now the opportunity of forming more far-reaching plans is open—so far as anything in human life is ever open. If a good opportunity should show itself in any site, and more extensive and expensive excavation there should be required we may confidently hope that the chance will not be lost.—British Weekly.

Social Problem of the Modern Pulpit

H. O. Pritchard

What should be the attitude of the church with regard to the social questions of our day?

The temperance problem, the divorce problem, the problem of the children, the problem of the poor and the still greater problem of capital and labor. While reformers are scattering their seeds of truth, while the workers in the slums are trying to ameliorate the sufferings of the poor, while the courts are dealing with divorce, while the socialists in their blind way are trying to work out an economic system that will be just, shall Christians still be content to sing songs and go home to dinner?

Or what is more important? Shall the man in the pulpit lift his voice against the sins of an age, against social injustice and against wickedness in high places, or shall he be a mere figurehead, mouthing out glittering generalities concerning literature and art?

Of all moral questions today none are so pressing as morality. What right have ministers to back away from these questions and refuse to contribute whatever discernment God has given them?

I am aware that the position of the Christian ministry today is an exceedingly delicate one. On the one side there is a wide cleavage between the church and the masses which as its ground in class consciousness. We hear much about the unchurched masses, and there is no use trying to deny the charge that in our great centers of population our churches only touch the fringes of the great fabric of cosmopolitan life.

The wage-earning class as a whole regard the church as an institution allied with capitalism and the local church as a social club. Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor said: "My associates have come to look upon the church and the ministry as the apologists and defenders of wrong committed against the interests of the people simply because the perpetrators are the possessors of wealth whose real God is the almighty dollar and who contribute a few of their idols to suborn the eloquence and intellect of the divines, and make even their otherwise generous hearts callous to the sufferings of the poor and struggling workers, so that they will use their exalted positions to discourage and discountenance all practical efforts of the toilers to lift themselves out of the slough of despondency and despair."

In the program of the radical socialists the church must go, for it is the organization of the rich. All this is on the one hand.

On the other hand is the attitude of the church itself. We regret to admit it, but we must. The church is out of sympathy with the masses. Many churches are made up for the most part of the rich and the well-to-do. Some of them who pay pew rent do it with money that has the stain of blood upon it. There are faithful attendants at the church services who esteem human life cheaper than dividends. Others who wring the life out of little children in factories. Others who ruthlessly crush their fellows in competition. Others who claim to serve the master of love, who build up their business success at the expense of justice and love.

On the one side is an unsympathetic world, on the other an unsympathetic church. Between the devil and the deep sea stands the man in the pulpit today. What is he to do? With all these stern realities of our changing social order pressing in upon him, with the sanctity of the home polluted by legalized adultery, in the midst of a generation mad for gambling, with saloons and brothels at the very door of the temple; facing a world in the darkness of heathenism, with a submerged tenth rotting in our cities, with an industrialism that is more murderous than war; with all this shall the preacher still be content with manicuring conventional theology?

What has the story of Jonah and the whale or the dimensions of Noah's ark to do with all this struggling and suffering host?

There is but one thing for him to do. He must be a prophet for his age. He must declare unto men, "all the words of this life." Being a man of God he must speak the Word of God.

To a dying world he must give the bread of life. He must lay emphasis upon the sinfulness of sin, and like every true prophet he must rebuke sin wherever found.

Let him use tact in so doing, but at the same time remember that the world will never be moved by tact. Some preachers are so tactful that their prophecies are never anything but smooth things to itching ears.

It is not his business to try trimming and straddling. He must hew as straight as the moral law. The pulpit is no place for the temporizer or the time server. God's judgment is set upon the false prophet in what ever age he may appear.

The Pharoahs of this world have to afflict them with burdens. The story of the bricks is again being doubled and straw is being taken away.

There is about to be another great labor movement, as there was in the days of Moses, for God has called out: "Let my people go that they may serve me."

An Important Union in Chicago

Richard W. Gentry

Since the union of the First Christian Church and the Memorial Baptist Church of Chicago has aroused the interest of all those Disciples who have known of its progress, it has seemed good that an account of the union and its consummation should be given to the brotherhood through the columns of this paper. As an illustration of how sometimes great things grow from small ones, the beginning of this movement lay in a casual conversation in April between the minister of the First Church and a leading elder of the Baptist Church, which was at the time without a minister. There followed from this conversation private conferences between members of the two churches concerning the possibility and desirability of union, and finally an informal meeting was held, in which about six representatives from each church discussed the matter of union. At this meeting a proposal was made that the two congregataions worship together on Sunday, May 3d, in the Memorial Church. To this there was unanimous consent, and the plans for that service were arranged.

On Sunday morning, May 3d, the two congregations united in worship at the Memorial Church. After this, the next step in the progress of the union was the appointment of a committee of twelve from each church for conference regarding the plan of union. A meeting of this committee followed and an outline of the chief points on which it was desired that an agreement should be reached was presented as a basis for the conference. This outline contained such important questions as the name of the united church, the plan of holding the communion service, the method of receiving new members into the united church, the method of choosing officers, the division of missionary and philanthropic offerings, and the financial matters involved in the union.

MEMORIAL CHURCH OF CHRIST (BAPTIST AND DISCIPLE.)
CHICAGO, ILL.

The result of the conference on these more fundamental questions was as follows: It was voted unanimously that in view of the fact that the church wished as far as possible to work out a plan that would avoid all cause of strife over names other than those sanctioned by the word of God, and since the name "Memorial" was an appropriate and familiar designation of the church, the name be "Memorial Church of Christ" (Baptist and Disciple), it being understood that the words in parenthesis may be dropped whenever it becomes desirable. It was voted unanimously that because of the custom which the Disciples have always observed of celebrating the Lord's Supper weekly, and for the reason that in many Baptist churches the same custom has been held, and that the Baptist churches hold no special usage binding, the Lord's Supper should be observed each week, in a manner to be determined by the Advisory Board of the united church. And the final unanimous agreement was that reception of new members by baptism, letter or statement of previous church relations, be upon the recommendation of the Advisory Board, and with the approval of the church; and that the invitation of the gospel be extended at each preaching service, at the discretion of the minister.

Following the successful working out of these important questions, the harmonious solution of which was due to splendid spirit displayed by both committees of twelve, there remained the questions of the relationship of the united church to the two brotherhoods, of which its uniting portions had been parts, and the necessity of arranging financial matters which the plan of union brought to the front, especially those missionary and other funds which went to fields outside the local church, and had to pass into the hands of other societies of the brotherhood. The unanimous agreement regarding the former question was that the united church should be in the fullest affiliation with both the Baptist and the Disciple brotherhoods, that the church house should be used to further in every way the interests and labors of both these organizations and that the congregation should give both of them its hearty support. In regard to the second question, it was decided that the Sunday schools, Endeavor societies and Missionary societies of the two churches should join hands, and that the funds raised by them should be divided between the missionary organizations of the Baptist and Disciple Brotherhoods. A final financial problem concerned itself with the church property of the Memorial Church. Our Baptist friends were in possession of a splendid working plant, located on Oakwood boulevard, near Cottage Grove avenue, and consisting of a commodious brick structure with roomy portions for Bible School and Endeavor work, and a pipe organ recently installed. On this church property, valued at about one hundred thousand dollars, there was a debt, small in proportion to its value, and it seemed only just that the Disciples should assume this debt, together with their Memorial brethren. Hence, it was agreed that a part payment on this, which was soon due, should be met by the Disciple congregation, and that the congregation of the united church should work together heartily for the liquidation of the remainder of the debt. The Ladies' Circle of the First Church, with the same spirit shown by the two committees, decided to devote funds which they had raised, to decoration and minor repairs on the church building, and thus give as early as possible evidence of their enthusiasm and interest.

On Sunday morning, June 7th, a pamphlet, containing in full detail the report of the joint committee of 24, was put in the hands of each member of the First Church, and the decision of that body, with thirteen dissenting voices, was that the union be consummated. On Wednesday evening the same action was taken in the Memorial Church, and an almost unanimous vote of that body, only three voices dissenting, declared for the union. Thus, after these deliberations and conferences, in which the spirit of Christ had been present, was the union consummated, leaving only some minor legal and technical steps to be taken. For the conclusion of these there will be a meeting of the two congregations at the Memorial Church on Friday evening, the 19th, and on Sunday, June 21st, the two congregations will begin their life as a united church.

Already opportunities for showing complete affiliation with both brotherhoods are coming to hand. On this first Sunday of the united church, Dr. H. L. Willett will preach the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the Baptist Training School, while in September the first sessions of the Illinois State Convention of the Disciples of Christ will be held in the "Memorial Church of Christ."

In its earnest endeavor to answer the prayer of Jesus that all his followers should be one, the united church asks the prayers and best wishes of all true soldiers of the Cross. It well knows that the whole problem is not yet completely solved, that perplexing questions may arise, that adjustment to new conditions means that new difficulties must be met and conquered with sympathy and love. These things it hopes with help from God to safely do, and great will be its joy if through it others shall be led to answer the prayer the Master spoke beneath the shadow of the cross, "That they may all be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me."

What the Sun Saw in Sendai

Maude W. Madden

Recently I read a beautiful story in the Christian Century, called "What the Sun Saw." It was a beautiful story of an outdoors party some children had in beautiful America. I am so glad American children do have such beautiful times!

After I finished the story I kept thinking, "and what do you suppose the sun saw as he left those American children and rolled on above the great Pacific Ocean and peeped up over the edge of the horizon on Japan?" Sendai is close, close to the very eastern edge of Japan, and is one of the very first cities he sees over here. So I'm going to tell you some of the things he did see one day. It's a true story, too, just like the American one, but it's not nearly so beautiful; and when I have finished you may guess why.

The first thing the sun did was to make sure that old Kinkwazan was in his place. Kinkwa Mountain, you know, is the landmark for ships coming from America—his rocky point holds out to them the first lighthouse on the Japan coast—and it's very important that such a sentinel should always be on duty. The mountains in Japan have a way of blowing up or shaking down sometimes—earthquakes and volcanos not being satisfied with an unchanging scenery.

Well, after greeting Kinkwa-zan, the sun peeped at Sendai: there the paneled sides of hundreds of houses were being slid back in their grooves and safely boxed at one corner for the day, and he knew all the people were getting up. Then most of the middle-aged and old, old people came out on the tiny porches, which are made when the side panels have been boxed; and they stood and clapped their wrinkled hands and bowed their graying heads in gratitude and worship to the sun. That's enough to make a proud sun love Japan more than America, isn't it? But our sun isn't a proud sun—he is honest, and wishes each one to have his just desert—and so I'm sure he is grieved, Oh, so grieved, because these people are so ignorant that they do not know the sun's God and the Creator of all. Yes, I'm sure he is grieved, for so often, after his first peep, he hides his face in mist and cloud. He does not stay long behind the clouds, however, because he knows the Japanese people have no stoves in their houses, and he just must mercifully shine out and warm their now wide open homes for them. So when he peeps out this time he sees the newsboys running with their papers; the Natto boys shivering and calling the bean food they have to sell; the milk men on their rounds, and many such things which are common sights all the world around.

More than this, in hundreds of Shinto temples he sees the priests beating their sunrise drums and chanting their sunrise prayers, for most of the Shinto temples are dedicated to the Sun goddess. In hundreds of homes he sees women and girls placing food, liquor and other offerings on the idol shelf before breakfast, while some of the men also worship there a brief while. Isn't it all very sad?

The sad sun must rest his weary eyes so he looks for something different. Ah, there is an early plum tree full of beautiful white blossoms; and beyond the plum tree a tiny Christian Church, beautiful and white, and beyond the church, beyond the gray, gray city, are the beautiful mountains, sparkling and shining in their robes of snow. Now the sun takes courage and rolls right up over the city and, lo! from almost every gate and house a cheery sunrise flag, with its round, red ball and snowy field waves him a welcome. How gay and bright it makes the city seem. Then he remembers it is the nation's birthday, the 2,568th anniversary of the coronation of Japan' first emperor—himself a descendant of the Sun-goddess!

Now he sees the boys and girls on their way to school. The boys, all except the tiniest ones are in school uniform, and the girls are, too, practically, for each school demands its own color for the girls' skirts. The Sendai children all go eagerly and happily to school—those whose parents can afford to send them—the sun has never yet see a truant officer in Sendai that I know of. After the crowd of Japanese children has somewhat thinned, the sun sees four little American boys start from home in the east part of town, two little English boys start from the southwestern part of town, and one little American boy and his older sister start from the southeastern part of town, and a missionary lady starts from her home in the far northwestern part of town, and they all meet in the Japanese Y. M. C. A. building, and have the school for foreign children. These children do not go along sedately on wooden clogs, like their brown cousins, but are racing along, each boy flying a kite as he runs, and it seems as if the sun smiles down at them as the gay kites leap and float up, up to greet him.

Because this is a national holiday the Japanese children will not have regular lessons. They will greet their teachers, hear the imperial instructions on education, reverently bow to the emperor's picture (which is taken from its specially built safety vault for this occasion), sing their national song, and then be dismissed for the holiday. Most of them will spend their time on the streets; the boys flying kites or playing a substitute for marbles with carboard disks, and the girls play prisoners' base and similar games, while they carry babies on their backs. The older boys and girls fill the down-town streets, the boys in the books shops and the girls in the dry goods and ribbon shops.

The sun sighs—O that the young folks of the Orient had somewhere to play besides the streets. O that the Sendai mothers had nice picnics, and parties for their little folks, in shaded grassy yards, like the little folks have in America. But in all this great city, and in many and many another, the nearest approach to a party was the yard at the kindergarten, when the little tots were dismissed.

As night drew on and the sun began to disappear he said, "I wonder what I'll see in Korea and China, for I'm due there next." Long after he had finally left Japan most of the Japanese boys and girls were still playing or sauntering freely in the streets, and no one seemed to care.

A Peak of Gold

Karl D. Keyes

On a beautiful November afternoon the Steamship "Utstein" (Capt. Aarsvold) was peacefully holding her course from Havana to Bocas del Toro. The day was brilliant with intense light from the tropical sun. The Caribbean Sea was calm and a gentle breeze from the east served to lessen the burden of heat. We had passed Cape Gracias a Dios early in the day, and off to the westward the shore of Nicaragua was plainly visible. The luxuriant tropical verdure suggesting shady nooks and rippling streams, while the range of low-lying mountains in the background, with now and then some peak towering above his fellows, served to complete a picture which was both pleasing to the eye and restful to the mind.

The first officer was on the bridge. Capt. Aarsvold was in the chart room pricking out the course, the first dog watch was on, when a cry from the officer on the bridge brought the captain instantly to his side. There was no apparent change in the peaceful aspect, yet I knew from the sharp orders which the captain issued, and the alacrity with which the crew sprang to obey them, that something of importance was about to occur. The watch which had gone below was summoned; moveable things were hurriedly made fast; hatches were battened down, and general preparations made for a storm which, to my inexperienced eye, was not yet visible.

The captain came down from the bridge and, after inspecting the steamer with a critical eye, retired to his cabin. Reappearing a moment later clad in oilskins and "sou'wester" he mounted the bridge and resumed command. A word from the captain and oilskins and "sou'wester" were brought to me, and I was invited to don them and join him on the bridge. Handing me a new pair of American-made binoculars of most excellent quality, he bade me watch the approach of the storm, which was even then upon us. A dark cloud to the eastward, which a few minutes before had seemed insignificant, now assumed a terrible aspect, and I watched its rapid approach with interest and awe. Oh, that I had words to describe the awful grandeur of that storm, the howling wind; the rolling and tossing of the steamer; the terrible downpour of rain which filled the atmosphere so thickly with moisture that we fairly breathed it; the changing color of the water; the sudden transformation of its peaceful surface from oily smoothness to the angry dashing of the storm tossed wave. The sun was lost to sight, and to me it seemed as if our end was at hand. Adding to our terror was the presence, nearby, of two gigantic water-spouts which sucked up great quantities of the sea only to hurl it back upon us in the rain, which was so dense that it was as though we were in the midst of a fog. Across the heavens, in dazzling streaks, flashed the lightning, and the accompanying majestic peals of thunder seemed to sound the diapason of the requiem which the wild winds were singing.

Suddenly the storm passed; the rain ceased; the wind grew less violent; the sun reappeared and its heat rapidly removed all traces of water from the decks; the hatches were opened, and save for the pitching of the vessel, nothing was left to remind us of the storm, which, coming up so quickly, had left us as suddenly as it had come, bearing its evil course toward the land. We watched it as it enveloped the shore, and soon we were apparently sailing on the boundless ocean with land obscured from sight.

I had removed the oilskins, but still remained on the bridge. I was thinking of the grandeur of the storm and of how insignificant was I in the midst of such a wonderful display of the powers of nature, when the captain, touching my arm to attract my attention, pointed toward the shore. Turning, I beheld a wonderful sight; one which remains with me, and will, to my dying day. There in the distance, standing out above the storm cloud, was one gigantic peak. Refulgent with the rays of the setting sun, it seemed like a mass of burnished gold. I gazed upon it, fascinated by its glory, and my breast heaved with emotion. Turning toward me, Capt. Aarsvold pointed upward and, with a stifled sob and with tears running down his weather-beaten cheeks, said in broken English, "Makes you tink up dere." My own eyes were wet. I looked again; yes, it was still there, that glittering peak. An instant more, and it was swallowed up in the storm cloud.

It was a solemn moment, for it seemed as if, after the awful storm, we had been permitted to catch a glimpse of the heavenly land where, towering above the storms of life, stands, firm and immovable that "Rock of Ages"—our refuge in time of need.

The sun sank beneath the horizon and night was upon us; the stars came out and shone with all that amazing brilliancy peculiar to the tropics; the wind had died with the setting sun, and the sea was calm; the ship trembled with the vibrations of the engines; the smoke from her funnels hung low upon the water, and all was still. The crew moved silently about, doing their accustomed work, still under that strange spell which was cast over us by the events of the afternoon.

As I sat on the deck in the darkness I still seemed, as in a vision, to see the golden luster of that glittering peak standing out above the storm. My mind was filled with tender and solemn thoughts, my heart with emotions, which can be felt, but not expressed.

The ship's bell clanged, the watch changed; the water fitfully gleamed with phosphorescent light, and we sailed on through the night, under the glowing stars of the Southern Cross, guarded by Him who "watching over Israel, slumbers not nor sleeps." Karl D. Keyes

FRAGMENTS OF TRUTH.

By C. F. Ladd.

Your theory of salvation isn't worth a cent if it contradicts what God says.

Some folks only read the Bible to find "proof" to prop up their ideas.

It is a good deal easier to talk Christ than to walk Christ.

Calling yourself a Christian does not make you one.

The only safe way—go by the Book.

Not what men think, but what God says, is what counts.

God will not change His plan of salvation to suit men's theories.

One "thus saith the Lord" is of more importance than one hundred opinions of the world's wise men.

If the Bible does not mean what it says, how are we to find out what it does mean?

Some folks seem to think that God is under obligations to run his salvation chariot along their little narrow-gauge track.

The Pentecostal style of preaching is needed today. People need to be pricked in their hearts rather than tickled in their imaginations.

The Commission makes every creature and opportunity for gospel work. And yet some folks can find nothing to do. Reader, are you working?

Some folks would have us believe that the Bible is not practical for today—that it is quite out of date. The Bible is all right. The need is—men and women who will believe and practice it.

The Sunday School--The Wine That Sobers

Lesson, June 28, Eph. 5: 6-21

"'Mind your own company,' says Paul," writes Rev. J. F. Cowan in the Christian Endeavor World. Don't go into partnership, don't go courting, don't go out for pleasure, with people of sensuous life, unless it is with the distinct purpose of doing them good, and even then don't, on your life, court or marry such a person. The fable of the ice and the fire applies to this seventh verse. The fire said to the ice: "Let us be good neighbors. Why should we criticise each other? You agree not to melt me and I will agree not to put you out." But the fire replied, "Nay, my friend; for I perceive that, if I do not melt you, my own light will be put out." The Christian must Christianize his secular companions, or they will secularize him; there is no alternative.

Are You a Graceful Walker?

There is the wine that makes the man zigzag on the sdewalk (if he is able to walk at all), but Paul tells us here of the wine that gives a man a daily walk with God. When your walk is with God, you are sure to have a carriage that every one will admire. In the schools for physical culture and dramatic training one of the first steps is to help the pupil "to find his center," from which all the movements of locomotion originate. It is near the base of the spine. The center of a man's spiritual walk is God. If he is centered on him, he walks gracefully. Every one admires the gait of a man who is daily walking with God; he doesn't stumble or slip or shuffle.

A man who is a prominent candidate for the presidency of the United States declined to visit a sailors' home that was doing a splendid work for our soldiers and sailors because there was just time to finish a game of "seven up" before he left the harbor. He shuffled that time. He did better next time he had a chance. But there is another man who has been prominently mentioned in connection with the presidency who has been placed in some trying positions, but has never been known to snuffle; he walks with God, and is not ashamed to own it.

Whom Are You Reproving?

Is is the business of a Christian to reprove wrong-doing, particularly debauchery and vice. I am afraid that we have been cultivating an over-niceness. We are pushing courtesy beyond the limit. I once saw the mayor of my city so drunk on a street car that he could scarcely take his seat. There were fifty of his constituents on that car, and not one of them reproved him. It was taken as a joke. I doubt whether any one reproved him privately. I am ashamed to say that I left it for others.

There is the newsdealer in your town who exposes and sells indecent pictures. Your boys see, and perhaps buy, them. You pass the place every day; have you ever reproved the man? You never knew the pictures were there? But you know now, or may know? Are you going to reprove him? If none of you fathers reprove him, he will think that he has your permission to tempt your boys to sensuousness.

There are a dozen other men, perhaps, in your community whom you ought to reprove. Leave it to Anthony Comstock and the other societies for the prevention of this or that? Let me tell you, this nation is never going to be made decent by societies; as our President is always telling us, it must be made decent by citizens. "Awake, thou that sleepest."

To the Man Who "Gets Full."

Not the man who "gets full" of the wine that makes him stagger, but to the man who gets full of the wine that makes him as described in verses 18-20. The real wine of life is the indwelling God. Alcohol is a counterfeit stimulant; it is a sham. The real stimulant, which nerves men for great trials, for heroic deeds, which makes glad from the heart's core to the tips of the hair, and never is followed by a splitting head the next morning, is the Spirit of God in the heart.

Say, brother, are you full of the wine of life? Are you continually going to the corner drug store soda fountain for some drink that is "good for the nerves"? Most of them are the devil's tools. Get the peace of God, and your food will digest better, and you won't have that nasty temper that you call nervousness; you will look out on life through cheerful eyes, and you will have better health and sounder judgment in your business. Take Paul's prescription, the wine of life, instead of the wine of death, and you will get Paul's after-taking optimism.

Next to the dram shop tippling, the drug store soda fountain tippling is becoming one of the most wretched habits of this country. I never saw a soda fountain in Jamaica, but I never saw so many cheerful smiles to the square rod. The drugless soda fountain, yes! But the devil is stealing a big march on us through the drugged soda fountain, and I am not loading cannon to shoot humming birds when I say so.

A Riot in a Rum Bottle.

That is virtually what Paul claims in verse 18. Paul isn't so ancient. Any city chief of police will tell you that in case of a great fire, an earthquake, any calamity that invites disorder, the first precaution is to close the saloons. There is riot in every cask and decanter. There are violence and rapine and bloodshed behind the bar; don't let it out!

San Francisco says: "Lock the riot up in the saloons!" Kingston echoes it. Galveston repeats the warning. Alcohol is the worst anarchist. Alcohol is hell. You don't need fire and brimstone—just alcohol.

Is temperance gaining ground, or losing? Is it worth while to keep on writing temperance Sunday school lessons? I don't know. Is it worth while to continue teaching the alphabet? I am pretty tired of A, B, C myself. O, yes, there are some children coming on to whom they are piquant novelties. I guess as long as we have to bake more bread to take the place of that which has been eaten we should keep on working at temperance in every way possible, and with all our might.

HUMAN NATURE AT CHURCH.

Outline of Sermon by E. S. Ames.

Human nature is susceptible to many influences and responds to them with a great variety of moods. As the lake is rough in storm, placid in calm, congealed in cold, reflecting stars under clear skies, so the heart of man is moved by changing events. A company of people summoned from all quarters by the alarm of fire, feel one instinct of fear and horror at the sight of men perishing in the flames. The same people in the competition of the street, struggle with each other in the contest for wealth. At another time they gather round a banquet table full of good cheer, fellowship and wit. The same people at church are surrounded by still different influences. They meet here in a place free from fear, quiet and at peace. They have grounded their arms and set aside their moods of contest and watchfulness. They are here, as men have been from time immemorial before their altars, in a truce against all exploitation, and in a compact of kinship and worship. In this way it is possible for people from very different ways in life to meet with "one mind" and "one heart."

In Christian worhip there is the sense of largeness, of vast distances and times, and of inexhaustible measures of power and goodness. Before these the proudest heart feels itself subdued. In opposition to these realities, one becomes conscious of weakness and guilt. In league with them there is uplift and strength. In the presense of the infinite and eternal, the difference between man and man becomes unconsequential, while the dignity and worth of every soul is multiplied by infinity. Such an effect is produced by the life and character of Christ. In the love which He displayed, the differences are overcome, and men find themselves bound together in a great comradeship of sympathy and service.

Every human being needs at times to put himself under such environments. We here enter into a mutual compact, with all the gods as witnesses. We agree to "play fair," and to live in secret the kind of life to which we are sworn in public. Then when we come back from our separate ways, we can greet each other with open faces and strengthen ourselves in a fellowship, deep and satisfying. Life runs in many currents. Some associations bear us upward, quickening, nourishing and purifying. Others carry us into eddying or stagnant pools, full of pestilence and death. The church seeks to find the currents which give spiritual health and beauty and to draw thither the multitudes of men and women.

CARES.

When one is past, another care we have;
Thus woe succeeds a woe, as wave a wave.

Robert Herrick.

The Prayer Meeting--Religion and Recreation

Topic for July 1, Mark 6:31.

Silas Jones

Recreation is necessary for moral and spiritual health. There must be times of release from toil for every one. It is, therefore, the duty of the church and its teachers to assist in all wisely directed efforts to provide the means of recreation for all the people. It is not of much importance how the rich man amuses himself. He may be a fool and his example may be hurtful, but he is of the small minority. If the men and women who do the world's work have the opportunity to enjoy themselves in a sane fashion, religion and morality will be promoted. Denunciatory sermons awaken the suspicion that the preacher fears that people will lose their religion if they have a chance to be happy.

Fatigue and Crime.

The quail reaching the coast of Italy, after its long flight over the water, is blinded by fatigue and sees not the buildings against which it rushes to destruction. Exhausting labor may blind a man to moral dangers. The needs of the body become so urgent that spiritual values are overlooked. Before we condemn a man on account of the amusements he seeks, we ought to know what would appeal to us if we were in his circumstances. If after a careful review of the conditions under which he lives we still feel impelled to condemn what he approves, we can appreciate the difficulty of the situation and escape the attitude of the Pharisee. It is a matter of justice that social arrangements be such that no man will be forced to labor until his spiritual faculties are dulled and he be able to find pleasure only in what is light and frivolous. If anyone gives himself to coarse pleasures, let it not be on account of the injustice of Christian people in driving him to labor beyond his strength.

Sleeping in Church.

There are many reasons for the drowsiness that is so conspicuous in churches. Bad air, dull sermons, and the stupidity in the things of the spirit that characterizes not a few members of the church, may be mentioned. But overwork is the cause deserving of attention in this connection. Men and women come to the Lord's house on Sunday morning so worn out with the toil of the preceding week that they cannot be wide awake during the sermon unless the preacher is sensational. The preacher who suits them exhibits some of the elements of a vaudevillist. Plain speech respecting the eternal verities of religion does not interest them. Many of them should receive sympathy rather than censure. They cannot help themselves. But those who can find time for rest ought to be instructed concerning the Christian duty of recreation. They ought to come to the house of worship with spiritual sense, alert and with all the windows of the soul open. The children in the home have a right to see parents at their best. We ought to be ready always to receive the best our friends have to give and in turn to reward them with our best. Useless fatigue is sin.

The national government has its Yellowstone Park and its Yosemite Valley to which it invites the people to come for refreshment of body and mind. Every great city has its park system. The playgrounds for children are institutions for the propagation of sound religious sentiment. Our God is the God of the open air. He is not easily understood and loved by the inhabitants of dark and dingy streets and alleys. The grass and the trees and the flowers and the birds have their message from the Creator. One who can rejoice in them ought to receive with gladness the words of Him who is the incarnation of divine love. Strength of body, strength of intellect, and strength of will are granted to him who lives in close communion with nature.

Christian Endeavor--Henry Martyn in India.

Topic for June 28, I Cor. 2:1-16.

Henry Martyn, in his brief life, produced a profound effect for missions. He was an accomplished scholar, "senior Wrangler" at Cambridge, fellow of his college, winner of prizes in Latin and mathematics. Converted by the university preacher, Martyn was turned to missions by his praise of Carey and by reading the life of Brainerd.

He was ordained in the Church of England, and became one of the East India Company's chaplain, reaching Calcutta in May, 1806. He labored first at Dinapore, then at Cawnpore, two places northwest of Calcutta, on the Ganges.

Fainting spells and fevers testified to the weakness of his body, and the fierce heat wore him out. His brave spirit forced him on, however, to labors manifold—outdoor preaching to the soldiers under a torrid sky, testifying before the heathen "amidst groans, hissings, curses, blasphemies, and threatenings," the building of a church at Cawnpore, and especially translations of the New Testament into Hindustani and Hindi. He learned Persian, and translated the New Testament into that language.

Our world's Christian Endeavor Convention at Agra, India, in 1910, will take us into the region of Henry Martyn's labors.

Increasing sickness compelled a sea voyage, and in 1811 we find him as Shiraz in southern Persia, translating the New Testament into Arabic, holding public and private discussions with the Mohammedans, and presenting to the Shah himself a splendidly bound copy of his Persian New Testament.

Again sickness compelled a removal, and he set out homeward on horseback for Constantinople, 1,300 miles distant. Complete exhaustion overtook him on the way, and he was obliged to stop at Tokat, in the center of Turkey in Asia, where the plague was raging. There he died, October 16, 1812, at the early age of thirty-two, and there he lies buried in the Armenian cemetery, his monument bearing inscriptions in English, Armenian, Turkish and Persian.

Incidents of the Work.

An old watchman of the Madura district, whose pay was but two dollars a month, sent his children to the mission schools, and by the greatest economy and self-denial kept them there until they could become teachers. And now one is a prominent catechist, two are pastors, and a daughter is a Bible woman; still another was, until his death, a useful teacher.

An Indian paper commenting on a successful operation performed by a women physician, said, "The age of miracles is not past, for Christ is still working miracles through women physicians."

An educated Hindu gentleman recently said in an article in one of the leading secular newspapers of India, "Christianity may be false and Hinduism may be true, but India is rapidly moving on to the faith of Christianity, and no human power can resist fate."

When Henry Martyn began his work in India, his one prayer was, "O that one soul might be led by my agency to Christ."

In Jhansi, India, four young men under missionary training have organized a "Society of Love." Its object is to gather men of the servant class, of whom there is a host in the city, into a social circle, have tea and light refreshments and spend some hours in religious conversation, Bible-teaching, and singing Christian hymns. This society has been popular and is doing good work.

Two years ago a Parsee in Bombay gave $50,000 to build a hospital for women and children. An Indian woman placed at the disposal of the government $60,000 for carrying on in one province woman's medical work, and another woman donated $6,000 for a hospital for women.—Dr. Clara Swain.

Joy is for all men. It does not depend on circumstance, or condition; if it did, it could only be for the few. It is not the fruit of good luck, or of fortune, or even of outward success, which all men cannot have. It is of the soul, of the soul's character; it is the wealth of the soul's own being, when it is filled with the spirit of Jesus, which is the spirit of eternal love. —Horace Bushnell.

Evangelist J. O. Shelbourne is to hold a revival at Larned, Kan., in November.

Orwin L. Adams is now engaged in reviving our work at Westmoreland, Kan.

O. J. Law of Eureka, Kan., preached the baccalaurete sermon at that place May 17th and the Memorial sermon May 24th.

Z. O. Howard, pastor of the East Side Church, Lincoln, Neb., has been suffering from an attack of erysipelas of the face.

C. C. Davis is to remain with the church at Brighton, Iowa. During his minstry last year the church was remodeled and was in every way prosperous.

The latest word from Earl M. Todd, Manchester, N. H., is that he continues to improve, following the operation for chronic recurring appendicitis.

The cause is prospering in Gurnee, Ill., under the ministry of J. F. Williams. Audiences are excellent, the parsonage has ized a promising Adult Bible class.

The many friends of M. M. Davis of Dallas, Tex., will be pained to learn that he is seriously ill, and his attending physician is very apprehensive of the final outcome.

At a "Patron's Service" in the Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn., Sunday evening, June 7th, Perry J. Rice made an address on "The Public's Debt to the Public Schools."

The junior choir of the church in Jacksonville, Ill., assisted by members of the senior choir, rendered the cantata, "David the Shepherd Boy," June 7. It was an enjoyable program.

Services in memory of Mrs. Helen E. Moses were held June 7th in the Ann Arbor (Mich) church. Mrs. Fannie R. Thomson, state president of the C. W. B. M., presided. Mrs. M. E. Harlan of Indianapolis made the chief address.

Walter O. Stephens has resigned the pastorate of the church in Mineral Wells, and goes to Austin, Tex., from which place he will evangelize. Brother Stephens did fine work in Mineral Wells. He paid off the heavy debt, and built up the church in many ways.

David H. Shields, pastor in Salina, Kan., has been called for his twelfth year of service with the congreation, and has the encouragement of a substantial increase in salary. Mr. Shields received the honor at the recent commencement of Kansas Wesleyan University, Salina, of having conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. We offer congratulations.

H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, has moved to Eureka, Ill., where the family will make their home during the present campaign. Mr. Peters reports that his work is progressing very nicely and from every indication the campaign aims will be realized. All letters should be addressed to him at Eureka.

Mrs. W. F. Daugherty reports that a church has been organized at Devizes, a village twenty-two miles northwest of Norton, Kan. The have 32 members and a Sunday school of 57. Harry Mitchell of Henley, Neb., is preaching for them half time until a man can be found for the place.

B. S. Ferrall, pastor of the Jeerson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y. writes: "Our Bible School's offering for Home and Foreign Missions amounted to $505, with more in sight. This is more than double the combined offerings of the school last year. The church decorations were elaborate, and the program carried out by the school unusually fine. The enthusiasm was inspiring."

The annual meeting of the Rowland Street Church, Syracuse, N. Y., was held last week at the church. The pastor, C. R. Stauffer, reported a gain in membership to the church during the year of 59, which more than doubled it. The Bible school more than doubled its enrollment and average attendance. Nearly every other department did likewise. In spite of hard times, the report of the treasurer showed that the receipts during the last year have been more than double any previous year. All missionary and benevolent offerings have been liberally supported, and an increase of salary was voted to the pastor for the coming year, as an appreciation of his earnest labors. The current year was closed from debt and the church in its various department raised over $2,300

A NEW CHURCH IN MILWAUKEE.

The last Lord's Day in May was a memorable one in the history of our cause in Milwaukee. On that day William J. Wright spoke at the morning and evening services of the First Church, and as a result, the offering for Home Missions amounted to $370, which is at least $150 larger than at any previous offering in the history of the church. We believe it will reach $400. In the afternoon, Brother Wright addressed the meeting on the west side of the city, where a Sunday school and preaching service has been conducted for some months. Brother Wright's address dealt with the formation of new churches in cities, and was so encouraging that at its close those present voted unanimously to form a Second Church of Christ on the following Sunday, June 7th. The new church was organized on the first Sunday in June, with two elders, four deacons, four deaconesses, and sixteen members. About forty persons have signified their intention to unite with the new organization, most of these coming from the congregation on the south side, and have the full sympathy and co-operation of the latter.

REDEDICATION AT NORTH VERNON, IND.

June 7th was a red letter day in the history of the North Vernon Church. Just five months previous J. P. Rowlison had accepted the pastorate, and at once began urging the remodeling and beautifying of the church building. As a result of this agitation the old pews have given way to handsome opera chairs, art glass windows take the place of the old style windows that had been installed, perhaps, fifty years ago, the inside vestibule with its great pillars, gave way to a colonial porch, approached by double flights of broad steps. The stoves are gone, and the basement is ready for the furnace. The interior has been papered, and the ceiling frescoed. On the above date the pastor preached to a rejoicing congregation in the morning and at night the different Protestant churches of the city come with their pastors to a

PHONE OPERATOR.

Regained Memory on Right Food.

The girls who answer your call on the telephone, must be quick, accurate, and courteous. They must have good memories, also.

Those who work night often get in the way of eating almost anything handy, which is apt to be the kind of food which does not rebuild waste brain and nerve cells.

"I have been night telephone operator for a number of years," writes a California girl, "and was formerly in perfect health, never knew an ail.

"But irregular hours of sleep and meals, and the use of pastry or any food that happened to be available, soon caused my health and memory to fail.

"The loss of my robust health worried me very much. And medicines seemed to do no good.

"Four months ago, mother told me it was the condition of my stomach that caused my trouble, and she believed if I would change to Grape-Nuts food. I would improve.

"Eager to regain my health, I took her advice and instead of eating just anything, I ate Grape-Nuts regularly, and at the end of four months on Grape-Nuts I am the happy, robust girl I once was.

"I have gained eleven pounds in weight, have good color, am strong and hearty and nothing seems to escape my memory. And all this I owe to Grape-Nuts."

union service, at the conclusion of which the building was rededicated to the service of the Lord. It seems to us that a brighter day is dawning for the work here. If we can meet our obligations to our pastor all will be well.

EUREKA COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

The commencement exercises of Eureka College were probably the most successful in every way since the foundation of the college fifty-three years ago. An exceptionally large number of old students and friends were present.

At the baccalaureate services on Sunday morning in the Tabernacle, J. H. Garrison, St. Louis, Mo., deilvered the sermon on "The Light of Life." The discourse will long be remembered for its breadth of treatment, depth of thought, and spirituailities.

The Sunday evening services were in charge of the Saered Literature department of the college. After the communion service, which was presided over by J. H. Garrison and E. W. Dickenson, Charles W. Ross, a member of the graduating class, delivered a forceful sermon on "Life's Plan, Purpose and Prize." The ordination service immediately followed, in eharge of Prof. Radford. Dean of the Department of Sacred Literature, Prof. Jones and Prof. Boyer. An impressive charge was delivered by Prof. Radford, as Charles W. Ross, Ellmore Sinclair, Myrtle B. Parke and May Hiatt were solemnly dedicated to the work of the Christian ministry. Miss May Hiatt has been appointed missionary to Tokio, Japan, and leaves for her field in the fall.

Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday were devoted to numerous interests—final examinations, field day exercises, annual meeting of the Board of Trustees, literary societies' eontest, and reunion. Wednesday evening the annual concert of the School of Music, under the direction of Miss Lillian Smith and Prof. Aumond, proved one of the most enjoyable and artistic events of the commencement week.

All the work showed a skill and thoroughness of training far above the average, and argues well for next year's work, which will remain in the same capable hands.

Class day exercises were of more than usual interest, and the College Chapel yas erowded to greet the Seniors in their final program. In the afternoon the alumni banquet attracted a larger number of old students than any similar gathering of the association. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Stephen Zendt, Oskaloosa, Ia., and Mr. Fred Hagin, Tokio, Japan. A busy day closed with the president's reception at Lida's Wood.

A great crowd greeted Judge McKenzie Cleland of Chicago in the Tabernacle on Commencement Day, and listened with rapt attention to his message upon the subject "The New Gospel in Criminology." The message of the address, founded upon the speaker's experiences in his work in the criminal courts of Chicago, was one of unbounded faith in humanity, even in the most degraded condition, and inspired all to a greater confidence in man.

At the close of the address President Hieronymous, on behalf of the trustees, granted the degree of A. B. to fourteen graduates: Addie A. Anderson, Gilbert S. Ball, Irma B Davidson, J. F. Felter, C. C. Foley, Prue A. Haddon, J. M. Hiatt, Lovell Hull, Myrtle B. Parke, Lawrence Radford, Charles W. Ross, Emory W. Ross, Ellmore Sinclair, Hazel P. Ferry.

Everything connected with the college points to a very successful year to come. The trustees, faculty and Centennial Committee with H. H. Peters as its field agent, are making strenuous efforts for next year. Last to come in line is the student body, who have organized under the name of "the Booster's Club of Eureka College." Nearly one hundred students have signed a pledge to return next year and do their utmost to bring other students.

A CALL TO SERVICE.

Wanted—Twenty-five men ready to go to Africa NOW and win the great Nkundo Race to Christ.

A great race of people are open now to US as never before in our history. Uganda had its martyrs and thirty of the noblest of Britain's Church volunteered and were sent out in one year into that rich harvest field. The Telugus had their great famine and the Church sent out the Gospel and food to them, and that great pentecost was recorded. The Congo is now challenging us to a day of like opportunity and like responsibility. The great Nkundo race of equatorial Africa are open to us and are BEGGING, actually challenging us with the call, "Why don't you come and teach us, also?"

An unprecedented situation! Village after village is calling "Come and teach us, too." Brethren, we can not, we dare not refuse or let this opportunity pass by.

The wonderful transformation in lives already wrought by the Gospel and grace of our Lord Jeusus Christ gives us surety of success. The marvelous evangelism of that transformed Native Church at Bolenge provides us a force of scouts who are not only courageous, self-sacrificing and consecrated, but are as well competent and tireless evangelists. They challenge our great Brotherhood at Home to back them. They are crying for teachers to direct and prepare them and send them forth to conqueror with the Light of the Gospel that dence darkness of superstitution and Fetishism and to WIN A RACE TO CHRIST.

Brethren—shall we, a million and a quarter of Disciples, be founr recreant to our duty?

Not only is the native field ripe unto the harvest, but now government and trader opposition is nil. Where before they hindered and obstructed missionary effo even of the native evangelists, they are now welcoming us and begging us to come and settle before the false church shall come with her lies and hypocrisies. THIS IS OUR OPPORTUNITY. This in itself constitutes a call, and WE have NOW open to us the great Bosira River and its tributaries. The "Bosira Munane," the "Great Bosira," with its thousands of villages, is waiting to hear for the FIRST time the name above all other names, the name o Jesus, and begging for the Gospel message of salvation. Will YOU withhold it?

A steamer costing between $10,000 and $15,000 will be necessary to earry the supplies and the messengers of Peace and Life to the millions now fighting their feuds and cannibal's wars, and to carry the message of Salvation to the sin-strieken inhabitants of that great river. Will YOU withhold it? Why, WE have hundreds of men and women who could immortalize their names and multiply and perpetuate their lives in a gift of this absolutely indispensable Messenger of Good Tidings. And they could do it to-day, if they would.

The gifts of that native church at Bolenge challenge us to a like liberality, to join with them in the sending of the Gospel Messengers. Africa is to be evangelized

"TWO TOPERS."

A Teacher's Experience.

" My friends call me 'The Postum Preacher," writes a Minnesota school teacher, "because I preach the gospel of Postum everywhere I go, and have been the means of liberating many "coffee-pot slaves.'

" I don't care what they call me so long as I can help others to see what they lose by sticking to coffee, and can show them the way to steady nerves, clear brain and general good health by using Postum.

"While a school girl I drank coffee and had fits of trembling and went through a siege of nervous prostration, which took me three years to rally from.

"Mother coaxed me to use Postum, but I thought coffee would give me strength. So things went, and when I married I found my husband and I were both coffee topers and I can sympathize with a drunkard who tries to leave off his cups.

" At last in sheer desperation, I bought a package of Postum, followed directions about boiling it, served it with good cream, and asked my husband how he liked the coffee.

"We each drank three cups apiece, and what a satisfied feeling it left. Our conversion has lasted several years and will conainue as long as we live, for it has made us new—nerves are steady, appetites good, sleep sound and refreshing."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter?. A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

by the African himself of each great race. BUT WE must first evangelize the evangelist and then teach and train them and send them out to preach to their follows. This is OUR task NOW.

Twenty-five men needed for Africa. Brethren, they are in our colleges to-day and are ready for service when the church says by her open purse, "We are ready to do our share." We will consecrate our means as they will give their lives. There is not a church of 300 members that should not or could not support their own representative, and receive in return such a reflex of joy and such an impulse to service as they had never before had. Here is indeed THE challenge to the Church, the graduates from Bethany, Butler, Hiram, Kentueky University, Drake, Eureka, Christian University and Cotner among the finest of their classes, young men and women who are willing and anxious to go to Africa to do their share of evangelizing the great Nkundo raee and give their lives, if necessary, for their regeneration. Can the Church afford to let this consecration of life go unused for the Master's Kingdom? Nay, verily, Our Lord is trying you, if you be worthy His name. He is giving you the opportunity of your lives—that of sharing with Him in the saving of the world. He is calling us in the miraculous transformations of a cannibal, polygamous and superstitious race into marvelous examples of hereoism and devotion and consecration in Christian service and giving as at Bolenge.

"The Great Bosira for Christ," our battle cry. The Nkundo raee—our crown. Let us be worthy the name we bear and give as we have never before given, really give in our great joy to our Lord and Savior, that His name may be known in "Darkest Afriea" and exalted among the heathen. Brethren, if we do not arise to this opportunity the millions still waiting to hear HIS blessed name will indeed "Tell God on US," as one of the wild villages challenged the native church, "If you do not stop and preach to us we will tell that God you preach about when we come to meet him, THAT YOU PASSED US BY."

Yours in His glad service for the evangelization of "Darkest Afriea",

Royal J. Dye, M. D.

THE FIFTH DISTRICT, ILLINOIS, CONVENTION.

This convention eommenced in the Chapin Church, Tuesday, June 2, at 2 p. m. The C. W. B. M. had the right of way, both afternoon and evening. Leading the devotions by Mrs. J. W. Porter of Mason Cit, Ia., Miss Laura V. Thompson, state secretary, in the absenee of the district secretary, Mrs. C. S. Mahan of Palmyra, presided. The reports from various auxiliaries showed a healthful growth. "Save the child and you save the world," was ably presented by Miss Clara Griffith, state superintendent of the young people's work. Then followed "Circle Work," a study by Miss Nannie Campbell of Lynnville, which was instructive. Following this came a series of questions and answers by the state secretary, which elicited considerable discussion.

At the evening session Mrs. Alice Wickizer, president of C. W. B. M. of Missouri, gave a masterful address on Centennial Aims, which stirred our souls and enlarged our vision of the "Great Plea."

The wateh word for the new year, "Be happy; each Auxiliary Organize another Auxiliary—each member win one."

Wednesday morning the service opened with song and prayer, when A. M. Rodgers of Springfield called our attention to the new movement in Bible school work by setting forth the great growth in his own school and church especially among the men. The new movement consists, in a nutshell, in definite, systematic aim, and close personal contact, man with man, etc. State Superintendent Depew led in a Bible drill, and encouraged us all by his babbling enthusiasm. He told us the Christian church has sixteen times more people today in teacher-training than all the denominations in the United States. Herbert L. Willett of Chicago followed, with such an address as only he could deliver, on "Illinois, and the Kingdom of Heaven. "The address was clear, strong, convincing and true to "our position." Seed thoughts of the address:

1. "An evangelism for souls truly born of God."

2. "More and more living link churches."

3. "The Bible school is the church evangelist evermore."

4. "This is the age when God's men are finding other men, and, with the open Bible we must overcome Socialism."

5. "More teachers are needed. How many mothers today are praying God that their sons may become ministers?"

6. "The home and the ministry do not today work and pray for young men to enter the high calling."

7. "We need a prepared ministry, a ministry prepared to cope with the conditions of the day."

8. "We must bring the religious world to that union for which Jesus prayed, which will destroy all of the erronious theories of present day religious ideas."

In the afternoon Mr. L. Pontius of Taylorville gave a wholesome address on the "Great Commission," and was followed by R. V. Calloway of Atlanta, on "the Bible School and Missionary Intelligence," and he in turn, by L. W. Spayd of Roodhouse, on "the Growing Preacher." His texts were: 1. An intelligent knowledge of God's word. 2. A soul filled with the spirit of the Lord, 3. A good soldier enduring hardness. Then came the veteran, J. Fred Jones, state secretary, on "Facing the Facts," which were placed before us as follows: 1. $50,000 needed now. 2. Twenty-five living-link churches. 3. An evangelist in every district. These great needs, and others, were driven home into all consciences present by this good man of God, who is growing gray in this holy cause, going in and out among the churches of the state trying to prepare them for a better day. He has led the forces for twelve years. During this time the State Missionary Society has brought into the kingdom 16,000 souls, 84 churches have been organized, 270 churches assisted, money raised, $101,000, whole number in state today 796, membership 103,000. In this district there are 118 churches, 67 ministers; the treasurer reported all debts paid, and $382.92 in treasury. At Beardstown and Hillsboro efforts are being made to establish churches, and other places are being looked after.

Wednesday evning, following reports of committees, Parker Stockdale of Chicago gave us a restful address—"From Darkness to Light," sparkling with with andhoum to Light," sparkling with wit and humor, which was riehly enjoyed by all.

Thursday morning there were a number of good talks, that, perhaps, of the most importanee, "Eureka College as Our Educational Center in the State," by H. H. Peters, field secretary, who has in his heart the-raising of $200,000 for this institution during the next two years. He spoke with enthusiasm and in the most optimistic vein of his work, and how he has been received by the churches. W. H. Cannon followed, speaking in the same spirit. The college is worthy of the assistance of every Disciple in the state. Brethren: If you want your children to follow in your footsteps, as useful members of the Church of Christ, educate them at your own college.

The officers for the ensuing year are: President, H. L. Hostetter, Verden; vice-president, Louis P. Fisher; secretary and treasurer, C. P. Baldwin, Havana.

The convention goes next year to Taylorville.

The district has a body of preachers who are Christlike, wise and alive to the needs of the field. The officers are good men, alive with missionary zeal. C. E. Bolman makes a splendid secretary.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Last week the Foreign Soicety received $593.75 from the estate of the late Henry Pressler, Lafayette, Ill.

The first four days following Children's Day the Foreign Society received $5,171.58 and 278 schools responded. All the indications point to a great Children's Day offering.

President A. McLean, of the Foreign Society, has recently visited about all our colleges and spoken to the faculty and students on world-wide missions. This is one of the most valuable means of missionary education.

F. M. Rains will dedicate new churches as follows: Newton Falls, O., June 21st; Jacksonville (re-dedication), Fla., June 28th; Louisville (Third Church), Ky., July 5th; Paragould, Ark., July 12th; Carterville, Ill., July 19th.

The missionaries in the Philippines report nineteen baptisms in and around Laoag.

The splendid new mission building in Manila has been secured and was recently dedicated. This will give our missionaries a great advantage. It is a large building on a prominent street. The ground floor will be used for a chapel; the second floor will be used by two missionary families. This property was secured at a great advantage.

Slightly So.—Rufus Choate once endeavored to make a witness give an illustration of absent-mindedness.

"Wal," said the witness, cautiously, "I should say that a man who thought he'd left his watch to hum, an' took it out'n his pocket to see if he had time to go hum to get it—I should say that was a leetle absent-minded."—Everybody's Magazine.

Stung.—"Life at best is but a gloomy prison," said the moralizing bachelor.

"So much the worse for men who deliberately choose solitary confinement," remarked the girl who had her trap set.

More Important.—"Can't I go out in the back yard and play in the garden, mamma?"

"Certainly not, child. You must stay in and study your nature books."—Life.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo, cloth, 140 pages, net, postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement, it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real may come to fruition that these ch are given their present form."

Early Re ons and Separation of Baptist d Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8v cloth, gold side and back stamp, $ A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents full stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

Jesus Christ is a fact. His character and influence are facts. They cannot be brushed aside or ignored by burying them under the general facts of human life. It is true that no other man has ever wielded such an influence. "When it is a question of the character of an individual." says Dr. D. W. Forrest, "we have no right to judge of him by generalization, however broadly founded, drawn from the action of others, but solely by what the facts of his own life testify."—S. S. Times.

"IF ONE SHOULD GIVE ME A HEART TO KEEP.

If one should give me a heart to keep,
With love for the golden key,
The giver might live at ease or sleep;
It should ne'er know pain, be weary or weep,
The heart witched over by me.

I would keep that heart as a temple fair,
No heathen should look therein;
Its chaste marmoreal beauty rare,
I only should know, and to enter there
I must hold myself from sin.

I would keep that heart as a casket hid
Where precious jewels are ranged,
A memory each; as you raise the lid,
You think you love again as you did
Of old, and nothing seems changed.

How I should tremble day after day,
As I touched with the golden key,
Lest aught in that heart were changed, or say
That another had stolen one thought away
And it did not open to me.

But ah, I should know that heart so well,
As a heart so loving and true,
As a heart I held with a golden spell,
That so long as I changed not I could foretell
That heart would be changeless too.

I would keep that heart as thought of heaven,
To dwell in a life apart,
My good should be done, my gift be given,
In hope of the recompense there; yea, even
My life should be led in that heart.

And so on the eve of some blissful day,
From within we should close the door
On glimmering splendours of love, and stay
In that heart shut up from the world away,
Never to open it more.

EDITORIAL

THE CHIEF DANGER OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

The nation has been astonished at the recent progress made in temperance sentiment and the victories which have banished the saloon from towns, counties and even whole states. Nothing like it has ever been known in the history of temperance agitation. Believers in a sober nation have taken heart as they studied the returns from recent elections, even the liquor dealers themselves have become so alarmed at the situation that they are proposing drastic reforms in the conduct of their business in the vain hope that temperance people will be lured into inactivity by such fair promises.

At this very moment when victory seems within the grasp of the friends of sobriety there is presented the unhappy spectacle of a strife between the Anti-Saloon League and the Prohibition Party for the credit and spoils of a victory which has not yet been won. At the moment when in union of all forces opposed to the traffic is there any hope of success, there has broken out such a feud as threatens to neutralize the best results of recent campaigns. The liquor men are not slow to see the advantage which this situation offers and to plan such profit from it as it so readily suggests.

The Prohibition Party is justly conscious of a long and earnest struggle against the saloon. For many years it has kept the fight persistently to the front. It has refused alliance with either of the stronger parties, insisting that any governmental approval of the liquor traffic in the form of license or tax was sinful. This prohibition campaign has been conducted with sacrifice, courage and perseverance. Even in the times when victory seemed most remote the leaders did not lose heart or relax their efforts.

During the past few years a new agency for the accomplishment of temperance reform has arisen in the form of the Anti-Saloon League. Believing that a non partisan movement was more likely to accomplish results than the Prohibition Party, the league has been organized in most of the states and has won notable victories in many localities. It has enlisted the co-operation of thousands of men who were believers in temperance but were still affiliated with either the Republican or Democratic party.

Between these two organizations there has never been co-operation, but fortunately hitherto there has been little open hostility. In principle and methods they differed, but each kept to its field and accomplished such results as were within its power. The Prohibition Party elected now and then an official in local campaigns or sent a member to a state legislature. The Anti-Saloon League waged campaigns in local districts and now and then drove the saloon out from some town or county. But in this recent tidal wave of temperance enthusiasm which has banished the traffic from so many sections of the country both these organizations have seen the tokens of success, each for its own methods and principles, and each has made the vital mistake of claiming all the credit for the results achieved.

The prohibitionists assert that it is the long campaign which they have been making for so many years which has now come to success and is destined to triumph in the overthrow not only of the liquor trade itself, but of the parties which have declined to take active steps against it. It cannot see that the Anti-Saloon League has had any conspicuous part in the victories that have been won. On the other hand the League asserts that the Prohibition Party had proved its inability to bring results, and that recent events are due almost wholly to its own organizing propaganda.

We believe that both these claims are wrong and foolish, and that the paramount duty of the hour is for the leaders of both these temperance organizations to come to some understanding which shall put a stop to the rivalry, friction and folly of the present hostility evident between them. The attitude of arrogant assumption of responsibility for success in whatever has been thus far accomplished is little justified on the part of either. Many other forces have entered into the struggle beside the Prohibition Party and the Anti-Saloon League. The economic factor alone has played an important part, and in the South the race question has been the most outstanding cause of the wave of temperance reform. It is absolutely foolish and fatal for the leaders of these excellent temperance organizations to ruin their opportunity for final success and to disgust the men and women who care for results rather than means, by such displays of temper and conceit as have distressed loyal and unbiased temperance people during the past month.

Honest doubt is simply faith seeking foundations.

Don't say "That's good enough." Don't borrow tools; buy your own. Don't let your lathe run and cut air. Don't be always looking for pay-day. Don't be too important to do insignificant jobs. Don't take off your overalls before quitting time. Don't try to fool your foreman for you may get left. Don't wait until Monday morning to fill your oil-can. Don't deny spoiling a piece of work if you have done it.—From "Practical Dont's for Machinists."

THE VISITOR.

One of the pleasantest experiences of recent years to the Visitor was the privilege of attending the district conventions of Illinois. These gatherings come in May and June, and form a fitting preparation for the state convention in September. They begin in the northern section of the state and are arranged to follow one another in due succession southward till all the eight districts have been convened in their annual gatherings. In order of their occurance the conventions were held at Freeport, Evanston, Galesburg, Mackinaw, Chapin, Niantic, Salem and Benton.

It has long been the theory of the Visitor that it is the duty of the president of the state convention to visit as far as possible the district conventions. He is not a state officer in any formal sense, and his duties have to do only with the convention. Yet he owes to the work of the state such interest as will take him to the gatherings of the different sections that sustain relations to the work of the entire commonwealth. It is not that he is an important figure in the district conventions, but that he is at least a reminder to them all of their connection with each other and with the larger convention, and that he may thus enlist their co-operation in making that coming convention a greater success.

The attendance at all of the conventions was excellent. The spirit was admirable. The men are making things go in the different parts of the state were there to add to the interest of the programs and to lend their influence to the forward movements contemplated in the different districts. The hospitality of the churches in which the conventions were held was ample and appreciated. The convention addresses were for the most part all that could be desired at such gatherings. The fellowship which is always the most inspiring part of these meetings was delightful. One comes away from such convocations more than ever uplifted in spirit and aware that the men and women of God who are working at the common cause in our great state are a host. The mere mention of their names would make a catalogue. It would be interesting to point out some significant features in the various conventions, such as the memorable service held by the women's section of the Evanston convention in in honor of Mrs. Moses, or the Sunday school session at the Chapin meeting, but such a list would include some interesting features in every one of the gatherings.

Of course, there were some of the state officers who attended all of these meetings and the continuity of interest and theme was maintained in this manner. J. Fred Jones continues with unabated success the work of state corresponding secretary, and is always ready with the right word at the proper time in any of the conventions. Miss Lura Thompson, the state organizer of the C. W. B. M., was similarly the inspiration of all the sessions held by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Clarence Depew, the state Sunday school superintendent lent valuable aid in addition to his regular theme, and H. H. Peters, the field secertary of Eureka, was a visitor whose presence was appreciated at all the gatherings. Others lent their assistance in some of the conventions, among them Miss Clara Griffin in charge of the children's department of the C. W. B. M., Mrs. Wickizer of Missouri, Mrs. Harrison of Kentucky and Mrs. Harlan of Indiana, who were at one or more of the conventions in connection with the women's work. Very valuable assistance was rendered at several of the gatherings by Parker Stockdale of Chicago, who took time to represent the interests of the state convention and whose generous and hearty invitations to come to Chicago in September ought to increase the attendance in a marked degree.

The condition of the work in Illinois appears to be the best in its history. This is to be expected, and yet it is not always true. But the wisdom of the state officers on the board, who through many years have had the interests of this work upon their hearts, has been justified by the results thus achieved. That which now waits to be done is the further development of the districts themselves into competent evangelistic activity. Three of the eight districts now have evangelists, but every one should be thus furnished. Further than this, the beginnings of county organization have been undertaken. In some counties there are several churches, and yet no local bond of sympathy and concerted action. There are several living-link churches in the state which support the work in some locality by direct contributions to it. Such churches, some eight in number at the present time, ought to be increased to twenty-five before the state convention, and the fund for evangelizing purposes ought to be raised without delay to $50,000. By such means the efficiency of the churches would be greatly increased and the progress of the kingdom in Illinois, insofar as the Disciples can contribute to that progress, would be definite and rapid.

The last week has afforded the Visitor opportunity for a brief attendance upon the state convention of Missouri, held in Kansas City. The sessions took place in the beautiful Independence Boulevard Christian Church, of which George H. Combs is pastor. It is always a delight to be in that city and meet the splendid men and women who constitute the working force of the Disciples, including such men as Combs, Richardson, Jenkins, Haley, Muckley and Long. The Disciples in Missouri are more numerous than in any other state, numbering some 175,000, with 1,400 churches, and half that number of ministers. They stand head and shoulders above all other religious bodies in numerical proportion. Their leadership has always been of the best. Such men as Proctor and Longan in the past, and Haley, Moore, Garrison, Richardson and their colleagues in the present ministry of Missouri are certain to be effective in the advance of the cause. The reports of the different departments of the state work were inspiring. The needs of the cause are those felt everywhere; a larger number of young men preparing for the ministry, a higher standard of ministerial education, a saner type of evangelism, an increased sense of consecration to the financial work of the churches, a new emphasis upon men's part in the kingdom of God, a greater awareness regarding the social movement of the time, and particularly the rising tide of socialism throughout the world. These, with a fresh emphasis upon the great plea for union which is the historic task of the Disciples of Christ, were the notes insistently struck at this great gathering. Even the continuous rain of many days which flooded all the lower sections of Kansas City did not dampen the ardor of the delegates nor greatly reduce the attendance upon the convention. The Disciples in Missouri, under the leadership of the state board, of which B. A. Abbott is the efficient secretary, are moving forward and upward to ampler grounds and greater success.

The Place of the Church

Henry F. Cope

The church stands in the community as the special organization and agency of religion. What has a man a right to expect from the church? It takes its place among the world's institutions, every one of which must justify its existence and its demand for support by showing the contribution it is making to the world's good.

If we are thinking of the Christian churches then they stand in the community avowedly to do the work of their founder. They are to be the community's spiritual leaders. This is the first thing we have a right to expect of a Christian church, indeed of any church, that it shall speak to our inner selves and lead us unto eternal truth.

But leadership is a larger matter than teaching or doctrine. Spiritual truth has to do with our own selves, with our natures and developing or dwarfing lives. Our need is for guidance and inspiration, for one who goes before and illumines the path for our halting, doubting steps.

The great need that drives us to church, and unsatisfied there, may turn us from its doors forever is this need of the inner life. If all the churches can do is to give lectures on literature and art, to render concerts, and provide entertainment we would rather look for those things to those who can do them better.

Man wants to look above himself; he would see beyond the clay; he would catch visions of those high ideals that have moved the race in days of old, have turned peasants into heroes, have made the weak strong, the cowardly valiant in fight, the meek to be the glowing martyrs and masters of mankind. He wants clear answers to the deep questions that rise in his own heart and conscience.

Not a day passes but that we realize that man cannot live by bread alone; in the glut of material things there is felt deep and keen the hunger for love and truth, for treasures that moth and rust cannot corrupt and thieves cannot steal from us. There never will be any question as to the place of the church that meets these deep needs and longings of men.

If, like her master, she has learned the secret of the life that consists not in the abundance of things possessed, that sets not its heart on silver or gold, if she has learned the love of life supreme over all passions, the love not of her own life alone, but of the fullness of life for all men, she will not need to ask for any other authority among us.

The world waits for inspiration, for the passion of great faiths, for visions that stir men to noble endeavor. Even our most practical concerns fall flat and barren unless they are animated by some great hope or dream. Religion is the passion that makes life worth while, that reveals its inner values, that enables every man to bear his cross and do his part for the sake of the life of all.

Often we criticise the church because she does not go into reforms, because she seems to do so little practical work. She does not need to go into such things as if no other could do them; she must be the force pushing the men out into their own service, the power that compels us to do the work we ought to do for the world's salvation.

But what is a church after all but the socialized expression of the religious life of a group of people. We ourselves determine what such an expression shall be. If the church fails is it not because we have failed to put our lives into her service? It is folly to sit down and talk of her sins; we are only condemning our own sloth.

To say, too, that we have no concern with the church simply is to say that we have no part in the social religious life of the community; we extradite ourselves from the higher, the spiritual communal life. We have a right to expect help and inspiration from the church only as we make it a means of help and inspiration to others.

Every man has in him some message for all other men, each of us has his share to give of the world's illumination and inspiration. Is it not our business to pool our spiritual possessions, to bring together every high thought and rich hope and through the association and gathering of men for mutual inspiration and help make the best good of each to become the common good of all?—The Chicago Tribune.

Believing is the secret of seeing.

Measure for Measure*

P. C. Macfarlane

The rather lengthy passage from the Sermon on the Mount, which we are to study, represents one of the elosing paragraphs of that great discourse in whieh Jesus has sketehed out a constitution for his new kingdom. Jesus has been setting forth the traits of eharacter whieh are to obtain within the kingdom. And to the man who has heard and hearkened to all these things —who has become a full-fledged citizen of the kingdom of heaven—Jesus addresses himself with some practical observations which are contained in the words of our text.

"Judge not that ye be not judged," is the first. A sweeping injunction that. My neighbor beats his wife and I am not to conelude that he is a brute and in danger of hell-fire. My groeer eheats me and I may not judge him to be a commercial thief. My friend betrays me, and I may not properly weigh and catalogue his act from a moral standpoint, and assign him to a place among the sons of Judas—among those who, having eaten bread with me, have lifted up their heels against me? If such be true, how then can I retain my own morality? The habit of making moral estimates, like some other things, grows by what it feeds upon. If I make a praetice of judging my own acts aeeording to moral standards, I will perforce judge the acts of my neighbors in so far as they eome under my observation. When I cease to make moral estimates of the acts of others, I will presently eease to consider my own. As this is furthest from the aim of Jesus, obviously he could not have been meaning to give any such injunction, and we must look for the significance of his words in other direetions.

The next observation of the Teacher is, "For with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you." Then if I form no judgment on my neighbors, but sit with placid face and folded hands, blind to their sins and to the evil about me, saying with some modern dreamers, "All is good, all is good," I myself will escape judgment at the last day. Is this the meaning? Obviously not. The whole message of Jesus is a message of judgment. "For judgment eame I into this world," he declared. The first herald of his near approach describes him as one who will lay the axe at the root of every tree, test the moral character of every man, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire. His teaching is filled witih the thought of judgment. The parables of the tares, of the dragnet, of the talents, the pounds, the wedding garment, the ten virgins,, the sheep and the goats—are all, all teaehing of judgment. The message of Jesus is, "There is a judgment for every man and no man can escape responsibility for the deeds done in the body."

The first statement does not mean that one is not to judge, and the seeond does not mean that by refusing to judge one is to escape judgment for one's self. Since these are the meanings that lie upon the surface of the words, we will have to tunnel for the real significance which Jesus meant them to have.

And we may as well prefaee our tunnelling with some reflections as to the people to whom they were spoken, and certain other facts of experience. The person who is skilled in any particular thing beeomes a judge, a critic in that thing. One cannot help comparing what one knows about a subject with the eoncrete examples of that subject with which one is confronted. The man who has made a study of painting, and is perhaps an artist of certain ability, can never see a picture without criticising it, that is to say, without judging. So the musician judges music. So the literateur judges letters. Jesus was talking to people who presumably have made a study of ethics, and are more or less successful performers in that line. They are religious experts—thirty-seeond degree Christians, if you please, who are going to judge as naturally as birds fly, or eritics criticize. Jesus has no thought that they will not judge; but he sounds a note of warning. On the threshold of judgment he would have them pause for a moment. A principle of Roman law forbade the judge to pronounce sentence upon a convicted man upon the day of his conviction, in order that justice might be untempered by prejudiee or passion. So Jesus would have his experts in conduet temper their judgments with deliberation, gravity and sober reflection.

The kernel of the Christian revelation is found in the Incarnation. One value of the Incarnation is the "put-yourself-in-his-place" attitude which God thereby assumes toward men. The message of God to man falls from lips that know how it is to be a man. This practice which God follows he urges upon men in those always remembered words, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." That is Christ's put-yourself-in-his-plaee theory, his Golden Rule, if you please; and our verses tonight are no more than his rule of judgment. Judge others as you would have them judge you, is what he is saying.

Before leaving the consideration of these sentences of Jesus, concerning judging, I would like to suggest that there is in them, as coming from Jesus a pathetic note that we do not often cateh. What man ever suffered so much at the hands of careless, blind and heartless judges as did Jesus? He was continually misjudged. Misjudged in Capernaum, misjudged in Nazareth, misjudged in Jerusalem; misjudged by his friends, misjudged by his enemies, misjudged even by those who were totally indifferent to him. Once in the bitterness of his soul, when they had charged him with blasphemy and falsely judged him to possess a demon, he turned upon them and pleaded, "Judge not according to appearances but judge righteous judgment." But alas, he was to suffer more than vexation of spirit and siekness of soul through being wrongly judged. Six hundred years before he came to the Jordan to be baptized of John, a spiritual seer had diseerned the ominous part which false judgments were to play in his life, and had seen that at the last they were to be fatal, declaring his conviction in the now well-known words: "By oppression and judgment he was taken away."

Motes and Beams.

And having delivered himself upon the subject of judging, Jesus eomes now to consider something more minute, the habit of fault-finding. Jesus was a marvelous dissecter of human character. Words were knives with him and sharper than a two-edged sword. His wit was never more rapier-like than when he rang the ehanges on the little parable of the mote and the beam. "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye and considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" A mote is a very tiny speck. It is so small I cannot grasp it, and if I could hold it up you could not see it. A beam—yonder is a beam fifty feet long in that truss there and weighing two thousand pounds. The chronic fault-finder is notoriously a person of grave defects of character. Every church is familiar with the type, exhibiting as it does faults so much more serious than those aimed to be corrected that we at once acquit Jesus of the charge of using an exaggerated metaphor. The Jewish teacher was not specially given to flashes of humor, but I feel certain that it was at least with grim satisfaetion that Jesus sketched out that sublimely ridiculous spectacle of the blind oculist, and with a suggestion of gusto set forth the same idea in a slightly varying frame of words with a more ludierously apt portrayal of the thought. Do you not see the almost blinded busy-body groping his own way along the street until he comes upon a sojourner with a small speck of dust in his eye, whereupon he immediately, with great assumption of skill and much pretense of knowledge, volunteers his assistance in removing the difficulty? Even the asses and camels would laugh at the picture. But in his white-hot earnestness Jesus has passed from humor to indignation, as, holding still to the furniture of his parable, he once more wields the cleaver in the words: "Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to east out the mote out of thy brother's eye." He teaches plainly that mote-hunting has its issue in hypocrisy. It may not begin in this; it may even begin in sincerity; but its method involves pretense, and its issue is a false pretense which is hypocrisy.

The Christian is to judge righteous judgment and to avoid altogether petty fault-finding.

Ah, yes, for the truest gladness
Is not in ease or mirth;
It has its home in the heart of God,
Not in the loves of earth.
God's love is the same forever,
If the skies are bright or dim,
And the joy of the morning lasts all day
When the heart is glad in Him.

What Shall India's Future Be?

Zonetta Vance

What shall be the type of children in India for the coming centuries? Shall it be as in ages past, that the girl must be married by the time she is eleven years of age, or no man will have confidence in her virtue? Shall it be that they be married when mere babies, and become widows of husbands they have never seen, except on the wedding day, and then through a veil? And must they go on, being widows for life, doing penance and service in the home of the mother-in-law? The children of America would not have it so. They have made a beginning of changing these conditions. They have provided school houses where girls may be taught. They have provided homes where hundreds of orphan children may be cared for. They have provided homes for missionaries, who are teaching of the Savior who blessed little children. These missionaries teach the people of the better way. The daughter of Christian parents in India is sent to school. With her first knowledge, comes the knowledge of things that are good. Instead of being taught to repeat the name of Rama, she learns of Jesus the Savior. Instead of going to make offerings to idols in the temple, she goes to Sunday school and church. When five years old, she goes to school and her mind is trained for usefulness, and she has daily lessons in the Bible. At eleven she is not taken out of school and married, but goes on to school. She may go on and be trained as a teacher, or Bible woman, then, after she is married, she may be a help to the people about her, and have something to do besides sit in her house and gossip with other women about trivial things. If left a widow, she need not be a helpless burden, spending her life in penance and drudgery, but may be a help to those about her.

And what of the boys? Shall they be left the prey of superstition and vice? Shall their knowledge be that of evil or of righteousness? Shall they be compelled to do the work their fathers have done, whether good or evil, or shall they be permitted to choose? Could you see the difference between the Christian and the heathen boys, there would be but one answer to this. The Christian boys are taught the Christian virtues, and they are taught to abstain from the heathen vices which are very many. They are given a conscienceness of sin. They are given a Savior from sin. They are made stronger physically, mentally, morally and spiritually, than the heathen boys of the same class. Shall this be true of a very few, or shall it be a state possible for every boy in India? What will you do for the millions of boys and girls yet not reached? What will you permit, nay help, your children here to do for them?

Jock's Li'l' Boy

Frank H. Sweet

"I can't let you off now, Jock," I expostulated impatiently. "These lines must be run by Saturday, and you are the best chopper I have. Can't you wait till next week?"

Jock looked down at me, a little reproachfully, I thought.

"I'se bleeged ter go, boss," he said decisively. "I done tole yo' my li'l' boy's wuss. Marg'et's Tobe jes' fotched me de news. I'd like pow'ful ter he'p yo'-all, but I jes' cayn't, don' yo' see?"

"Very well," I answered irritably, as I opened my pocketbook and counted out the money due him. "Only don't come whining around for more work. I can't be forever taking on new hands and teaching them the ropes. I want men who will stand by me."

I spoke rather more vehemently than I meant to, but I liked Jock, and was very unwilling to have him go. He had been with me only a few weeks, but was already worth any two men I had. Considerably over six feet in height, and strong and massive in proportion, he was at once fertile in expedients and perfectly obedient to orders. These two unusual attributes were what had recommended him to me in the first place, for my experience with negroes had taught me that they were usually dull and shiftless. But Jock was different from any man I had ever met, white or black. He was an indefatigable hunter and fisherman, and there was not a bird, or beast, or phase of wood life, with which he did not seem to be familiar. And his familiarity was not that of ignorance. I was often astonished at the stray bits of scientific information which came unconsciously from his lips. He never seemed to get weary, and out of work hours was usually off in the woods, or busy about the camp-fire. Most of our game was caught by him during the night, and, indeed, most of it was prepared by him also, for he seemed to know more about cooking than than our camp boy himself.. Nearly every day he brought me a delicious stew or roast which he had prepared himself, and always presented it with some such remark: "De doctor show me 'bout dis," or " Dis de way de doctor done hit."

I was thinking regretfully of these extra dishes as I turned my instrument around, and sighted back over the line. Everything was all right, and I signaled to the rear man to come forward. As I took out my field-book to make some notes, I was conscious of a touch on my shoulder.

"What, not gone yet?" I asked.

'No, boss; I cayn't go disaway. Ef I ain't come back no mo', I don' wan' yo' t'ink ob me as no 'count nigger. I jes' bleeged ter go."

"Oh. that's all right,"' I answered, a little ashamed of my ill-temper. "You needn't mind what I said about not coming back. I was out of sorts. If I have a place I shall be glad to take you on any time."

The black face cleared instantly.

"T'ank you, boss! T'ank yo' sah! I like ya'-all's wuk. Yo'se de bes' boss I'se had, cep'n de doctor."

I glanced down the line. The rear man was fully a quarter of a mile away, and walking slowly. It would be ten minutes before he would arrive. I slipped the field-book into my pocket, and sat down upon a stump.

" Who is this doctor you are forever talking about Jock?" I asked. "I am getting curious about him."

Jock's face became grave once more. I fancied I could see tears glistening in his eyes.

"He's the bes' man dat eber lib, sah; de bes' man de good Gawd eber made. I been his body-sarbent for ten year, an' wuk for him, an' watch ober him, an' nuss him. I watch him so I almos' know w'at he t'ink 'bout. He didn't hab no fo'ks, nowhars; an' he uster say I war his'n's fambly. He tuk me in de woods w'en he hunt bugs an' t'ings, and he tuk me in de city w'en he wuk for de pore fo'ks. He done let me h'ep in mos' eberyt'ing he do."

"How came you to leave him?"

"I didn't leabe him, sah; he done lef' me. De good Gawd tuk him. W'en de yaller fever bruk out, he wuk night an' day, lak he allers do. Mos' eberybody git outen de city; but de pore fo'ks hatter stay, an' de doctors and nusses hatter stay ter look arter 'em. Dr. Hatton stand hit for seben week, den he tuk de fever an' die."

"Dr. Hatton!" I exclaimed; "that name sounds familiar."

"Co'se hit do, sah. De papers war full ob hit. De doctor war a rich man, an' he done gib bofe his life an' money to de cause. I reckon de whole worl' done hear 'bout'n him. He wuk night an' day, all de time, an' nebber t'ought ob res'."

" And you remained with him through it all?" I asked.

"Ob co'se!" Jock answered simply. "De doctor 'lowed I war good he'p. I war big an' strong, an' could wuk roun' an' lif' de sick fo'ks."

" And you didn't get the fever?"

" No, sah!" showing his teeth a little. "I reckon dis nigger's skin too t'ick for fever get frou. W'en de doctor die I hab no wuk, so I nuss roun, till de winter come an' brek de fever. Den I pick up all de doctor's b'longin's. Yo' see," his voice growing low and tremulous, "de doctor done tole me sell eberyt'ing he hab lef', an' buy me li'l' home somewhar. I git fo' hundred dollar, an' come disaway. You know?"

I nodded. I had often seen and admired Jock's little vine-covered cottage, and wondered at his exquisite taste in shrubs and flowers. On one occasion I had met him walking back and forth, crooning some strange African melody to a pitiful mite of humanity in his arms. Perhaps this was the "li'l' boy" he was so fond of.

'How old is your little boy?" I asked.

The Sunday School--Israel's Expanding Life.*

H. L. Willett

With the third quarter of the current year the International Lessons pass from the New to the Old Testament. After completing the story of the life of Christ as told in the Fourth Gospel the scene changes to the drama of ancient Israel at the time when under the leadership of Samuel it was becoming conscious of its united interests and disatisfied with its former anarchic conditions. For the remainder of the year the lessons will relate to the beginning of Israel's organized career as a nation, ending with the close of Solomon's reign. In many regards this is the most interesting period of Hebrew history, although its problems are comparatively simple. There is little of that complexity which makes the period of the exile or the times of Ezra and Nehemiah fascinating. And yet it is a significant moment in the history of that nation through which the divine purposes have been manifested as through no other, and the study of the characters of Samuel, Saul, David and Solomon will ever be of profound value to the reader of the Old Testament.

The Histories.

The books of Samuel and of Kings form a long and fairly continuous narrative of events from the close of the Judges period to the downfall of the Hebrew state. They are the prophetic records preserved out of the great mass of state writings that must at one time have been in possession of the nation. They were really collections of sermons preached by prophets in Jerusalem and the cities of Judah during the royal period. Their emphasis is upon national righteousness, and they lose no opportunity to point out the tragic results of disobedience to the divine will. They are parallel for the most part to the great priestly records contained in the books of Chronicles, Ezra 1, Nehemiah. The latter place their emphasis upon the priestly and ritualistic features of Israel's life, but the prophetic narratives are concerned with the deeper principles of justice, mercy and truth.

The Books of Samuel.

The Books of Samuel, like several other documents in the Old Testament, are composite works, made up upon the basis of earlier records derived from different sources. Through the earlier chapters of 1 Samuel, there run two main threads of narrative. The first is the comparatively early story of Saul's life, written perhaps about 850 B. C., and comprising a part of the larger Judean document, which constitutes one of the main sources of Old Testament history. The second is a series of narratives closely associated with the life and work of Samuel, and apparently the product of literary activity in the northern kingdom at some period previous to Josiah's reformation in 621 B. C. The analysis of these documents respectively may easily be secured from any of the modern introductions to the books of the Old Testament, such as Driver or Macfayden, and also from Prof. Kent's "Israel's Historical and Biographical Narratives," where the material is placed in parallel columns.

Samuel's Journeys.

The present study is taken from the Ephraimite or North-Israel narrative of Samuel's career, in which the prophet's importance and authority are constantly emphasized. Through the twenty years of Samuel's active ministry, during which he went about from city to city holding those protracted meetings which were called sacrificial feasts, he had developed in Israel the sense of national unity to such an extent that the old isolation of tribes and clans gave way to concern for closer relations among the communities in Israel, and inspired a growing demand for a king. The greatest compliment that could be passed upon Samuel's success as a leader was this same demand for a king who should stand at the head of a united nation

Samuel's Sentiments.

Our narratives vary as to Samuel's attitude toward this question. In the Judean record (1 Sam. 9: 1- 10: 7) Samuel himself took the initiative toward securing a monarch for Israel at the time when the national welfare appeared to demand such a step. There is no hint that he did not regard this as the completion of his own preparatory efforts. But in the Ephraimite record (1 Sam. 7:15-8:22) the prophet is represented as surprised and grieved at the popular request which seems to throw discredit upon his own work as judge and leader. It is not difficult to understand that to the writers of Samuel's life, concerned as they were for the prophetic authority, the latter view was the true one, and the election of Saul only a concession to national pride.

Samuel's Warning.

The present study concerns itself especially with Samuel's warning to the nation regarding the dangers of this new experiment in government. The picture he draws of royal tyranny and usurpation of privilege bears the manifest marks of those oppressions under which the nation suffered in the days of Solomon and some of his successors. The policy which made the king not only the chief figure in the state, but the one for whose welfare the people existed, was not congenial to so simple and rural a people as Israel, but it soon became their experience after the rise of the house of David. We are given to understand that Samuel warned the people against these dangers on the eve of their earnest demand for a king.

Such a ruler would want a standing army, which meant chariots, horsemen and runners. It would mean large, royal domains cultivated by enforced labor and such taxes in the form of products or money as would support a court. The rule of favorites to whom gifts taken from the people would be transferred was another danger of such a monarchy. All the products of the fields and the pastures would be subject to the taxes needed by the government. Such a condition would cause them to repent of their hasty and foolish desire for a king. but such repentance would come too late, for monarchy once established was not easily overthrown.

An Ideal.

It was impossible that such an ideal as that hinted at in Samuel's words should be realized in Israel. It was probably inevitable that government should arise among that people as elsewhere. The words of the prophet reflect rather the dreams of occasional seers who have pictured a theocracy without need of human rulers, than the actual needs of a growing nation just expanding into its first active life. But the lesson gives us at least one view of government held in the minds of some of Israel's prophets regarding a rule in which God alone should be the king and his prophets interpreters of his will.

RUDYARD KIPLING AND THE SALOON.

Rudyard Kipling has been wont to stigmatize temperance people. He was not and is not a total abstainer. But recently he saw two young men get two girls drunk and then lead them reeling down the street. That started Rudyard Kipling to thinking:

"Then, recanting previous opinions, I became a Prohibitionist. Better it is that a man should go without his beer in public places and content himself with swearing at the narrowmindedness of the majority; better it is to poison the inside with very vile temperance drinks, and to buy lager furtively at back doors, than to bring temptation to the lips of young fools such as the four I had seen. I understand now why the preachers rage against drink. I have said: There is no harm in it, taken moderately; and yet my own demand for beer helped directly to send these two girls reeling down the dark street to—God alone knows what end. If liquor is worth drinking, it is worth taking a little trouble to come at—such as a man will undergo to compass his own desires. It is not good that we should let it lie before the eyes of children, and I have been a fool in writing to the contrary."—Exchange.

The Prayer Meeting--The Body a Temple

Topic, July 8. 1 Cor. 6:19-20.

Silas Jones

That the body and mind are intimately related is a fact which men have long known. The common man is aware of it and the philosopher bases his speculations upon it. To use the words of Professor James Rowland Angell, we know "that our consciousness or knowledge of the world about us depends primarily upon the use of our senses. A person born blind and deaf has neither visual nor auditory sensations or ideas, and never can have so long as he remains destitute of eyes and ears. By means of the other senses he may be taught about colors and sounds, as Helen Keller has been; but he never can have the experience which you and I have, when we see a color or hear a sound, or when we permit a melody " to run through our heads," as we say, or when we call into our minds the appearance of a friend's face. Indeed, if a child becomes blind before he is five years old he commonly loses all his visual ideas and memories just as completely as though he had been born blind. There is every reason to believe that if we were deprived of all our senses from birth, we could never possess knowledge of any kind. The senses thus hold the keys which unlock the doors of intelligence to the mind, and senses are physical, not mental, things. Apparently, therefore, the most simple and fundamental operations of consciousness are bound up with the existance and activity of certain bodily organs.

Plotinus, the Neo-Platonist, is said to have been ashamed that he had a body. He gave no honor to his parents and never remembered his birthday. In the light of our common knowledge, we can say that Plotinus would not have been able to think about anything if his body had not been his helper. It was rather ungracious of him to speak disrespectfully of so useful and faithful a friend. His error is explained in part by the fact that he saw so many people devoting themselves without reserve to the pleasures of sense. The evils into which men were led bodily demands seemed to him to prove that the body itself was an evil thing. Disparagement of the body became the fashion in certain sections of the church of the middle ages. The error of the church arose from the difficulty Christian people had in subduing their passions. There seemed to be war to the death between the body and Christian ideals. Had not Paul written of the warfare of flesh against spirit and of spirit against flesh? Could a Christian use his body well and not sin against God. These men forgot or never learned one thing. Paul taught that the body was to be redeemed from the domination of evil impulses and made an instrument of righteousness. Paul condemned the wrong use of the body, not the body itself. "Or know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit?" High honor therefore does the body receive from the apostle.

The care of the body is a solemn religious duty. If our knowledge of the world, of man, and of God depends upon the senses, these ought to be in condition to give us correct reports. Wrong impressions set us at variance with one another and with God. The piety that announces itself in criticisms of everybody and everything is nothing but dyspepsia. Nervous disorder explains many fervent exhortations. Tears are not always evidences of genuine sympathy; they frequently indicate lack of self-control and nothing more. The need of the church is a religion of healthy mindedness. Back of healthy mindedness in religion is health of body. Great is the debt of religion to men and women of feeble body, but the main part of the Lord's work has been done by the physically strong. A strong body is the rightful habitation of the human spirit. It is the duty and should be the joy of every disciple of Jesus to provide for his soul a proper habitation.

Christian Endeavor--Satisfaction

Topic, July 5. Psalm 63

HAVE YOU TRIED THIS METHOD?

By Rev. R. P. Anderson.

The word "satisfaction" comes from the Latin satis—enough, and facere—to make: to make enough! The country boy who, standing on the beach and looking at the sea for the first time, said, "At last here is something there is enough of," expressed a great truth. You can have enough things—houses, lands, riches, possessions; but you can never have enough of doing things, or achievement!

On the old Spanish coins were stamped the pillars of Hercules, with the inscription, "Ne Plus Ultra"—nothing beyond. But when Columbus sailed westward through this pillared doorway of the ocean, and discovered America, the "Ne" had to be removed, and the inscription read, "Plus Ultra"—something beyond. So for man, no matter what he attains or achieves, there is a great plus ultra calling, and every achievement turns into discontent that pushes him out toward something still higher.

Thus satisfaction is only found in action, never in stagnant idleness.

There is the satisfaction of service. Even heaven is not idle enjoyment. Thomas a Kempis' teacher asked the class one day to quote that verse in Revelation which, to their minds, best expressed the idea of heaven. One said, "There shall be no night." Another, "His name shall be on their foreheads." A third, "There shall be no more curse." But Thomas said, "His servants shall serve him." That alone, the easy, joyful activity of the soul, is satisfying.

There is the satisfaction of achievement. The old punishment of making a man tread a wheel, the "treadmill," that had no other aim than to compel the man to do something, and weary him without accomplishing anything useful, was cruel and barbarous. To wander around in a circle, without ever getting anywhere, is soul-destroying. No matter how humble one's service may be, if it accomplishes some good, there is satisfaction in it. Even manufacturing pins may bring satisfaction, for it is a social service.

There is the satisfaction of knowing and seeing God. "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with His likeness" is even more appropriate to present conditions than to the future life. Indeed, we can never be fully satisfied until we awake from the illusions of sin into His likeness! There is a power in nature pushing us on. The plant in the cellar reaches out to the sunlight; the soul of man, to God. John Burroughs compares his search for truth to the tendrill of the vine that clutches blindly whatever it touches, and clings to it. The discontent of the heart, all its yearning, clutches at things—and fails to find peace. But when the tendril grips God. the soul finds its true support, and is at rest.—C. E. World.

A SPECIAL MESSAGE ON THE TOPIC.

By Rev. James J. Dunlop, D. D.

"My soul thirsteth for thee." The souls of all men do, but many do not interpret their longings aright. They follow this and that worldly path to find the waters of satisfaction, only to return disappointed. Human restlessness is a symptom of thirst for God. The first thing is to realize the meaning of this longing we all feel. It is a longing that can be met only in God.

The second thing is a definite resolve—"Earnestly (Revised Version) will I seek thee." Do you know what it means to seek earnestly for something? Remember Jesus' words, "Seek, and ye shall find." The earnest seeker after God never failed to find Him.

Then comes the sense of satisfaction (verse 5). God alone can satisfy the longings He has created for Himself. The proof is not an argument for t, but an experience of it. "O taste and see that the Lord is good!" "Satisfied"—then joy in the heart and praise on the lips. In this direction lies our happiness.—C. E. World.

CHRISTIAN COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

Christian College, Columbia, Mo., had an unusually interesting commencement this year. Twenty-seven young ladies received diplomas and certificates. This was the first year when the new curriculum was enforced. The result was very satisfactory. It has now been demonstrated that first-class college work can be done, as well as work preparatory for college, in a college for women in the West. Christian College has led in this direction, and while it is not claimed that it has attained to perfection, or has a faculty in every respect organized for the highest possible degree of work, it is easily apparent from a year's experience that the college has taken the right stand and is evidently on the road to the position to which a first-class college for women in the West should ultimately reach.

The new catalogue, which has been somewhat delayed by the printers, is now ready for distribution, and will be sent to the address of those seeking information with respect to the college. The catalogue is itself a work of art, while the panoramic frontispiece gives a very impressive view of the college and campus. These were never in better form than at the present time. Large expenditures have been made in beautifying the grounds and providing for numerous permanent equipments, so that at the present time the college and premises are practically all that can be desired, and cannot fail to have a refined influence upon the young women who may come to Christian College to secure an education. It is believed by the management that a beautiful and healthful environment is as necessary as anything else in the education of young women.

In order to relieve Mrs. W. T. Moore, the president, from the double duty of managing the business as well as the academic superintendency of the college, the Hon. Morton H. Pemberton will, during the coming year, be business manager. Surely Mrs. Moore has earned this much relief from the strenuous double duties which she has been compelled to perform for several years past. This relief will enable her, in a large de-

Grape-Nuts a Perfectly Balanced Food.

No chemist's analysis of Grape-Nuts can begin to show the real value of the food—the practical value as shown by personal experience.

It is a food that is perfeetly balanced, supplies the needed elements of brain and nerves in all stages of life from the infant, through the strenuous times of active middle life, and is a comfort and support in old age.

"For two years I have used Grape-Nuts with milk and a little cream, for breakfast. I am comfortably hungry for my dinner at noon.

"I use a little meat, plenty of vegetables and fruit, in season, for the noon meal, and if tired at tea time, take Grape-Nuts alone and feel perfectly nourished.

"Nerve and brain power, and memory are much improved since using Grape-Nuts. I am over sixty and weigh 155 lbs. My son and husband seeing how I had improved, are now using Grape-Nuts.

"My son, who is a traveling man, eats nothing for breakfast but Grape-Nuts and a glass of milk. An aunt, over 70, seems fully nourished on Grape-Nuts and cream." "There's a Reason."

gree, at least, to give her undivided services in directing the college work proper, so it is expected that the coming collegiate session will be one of the best in the history of the college.

During the commencement exercises the Alumnae Association was reorganized and definite arrangements were made for a home-coming of all the old graduates and students of past years to attend the next commencement week, when it is expected a great reunion of Christian College girls and women will take place.

CALIFORNIA CONVENTION.

The annual convention of our Southern California and Arizona Churches will assemble at Long Beach, Cal., August 5 to 16. Chas. S. Medbury of Iowa, pastor of the largest church in the Brotherhood, will be chief speaker. Mrs. Effie Cunningham will add interest to the C. W. B. M. sessions, and Dr. Royal J. Dye and wife, known throughout christendom for heroic work at Bolengi, Africa, will bring a message to our churches that will make this year of our Lord to stand out as a landmark in the history of our coast work.

Let every one plan now to attend the Long Beach convention next August 5 to 16. Grant K. Lewis, Sec'y.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA TO THE FRONT.

Compassed by difficulties, yet not overcome, and with characteristic faith, the Southern California Board of Evangelization has stalked in line with the "Forward Movement," and by one long stride taken its place at the head of the procession.

Believing the Sunday school to be the most important factor in the building up of the church, and feeling the need of improved, up-to-date Sunday school methods in their churches, they have decided to put a Sunday school specialist in the field.

We are fortunate enough to have at hand a man well equipped for this work, and on last Sunday the Long Beach Church was asked to release their pastor, Rev. E. W. Thornton, that he might enter upon this work early in the fall. Brother Thornton already enjoys an enviable reputation as Sunday school specialist, both locally and nationally. The State Interdenominational Sunday School Union recognizes his ability inasmuch as no name is more constantly printed in their programs than his, and it is within a year that one of our greatest publishing houses, famous for its business sagacity, undertook to put him in the general field as a Sunday school man.

A phenomenal incident is now under way. The Long Beach District Sunday School Union, comprising all of the Sunday schools in the various denominations about that city, elected Brother Thornton, and are now raising the money to send this (Campbellite) minister to the great Interdenominational Convention at Louisville as their delegate this month.

It is a part of the program to send Brother Thornton on a three months' tour to visit all the great Sunday schools in the East, and to confer with all of the great Sunday school men of the land. This, with his present eminent qualifications for the work, will make him in the equal, if not the peer, as a Sunday school specialist, to any man in our or any other Christian community.

We hope to have him back from the East ready to take up the work of Sunday school revivals under our Board by November 1.

Further plans will be published in the course of time. Grant K. Lewis, Sec'y.

NEXT SUNDAY THE GREAT DAY.

Next Sunday the Endeavorers of the Disciples will observe Inland Empire Day. Not every society will be fortunate enough to line up with the Centennial Brigade on next Sunday but a large number of them will. It looks now as if the Young People's Department of the American Christian Missionary Society might realize the Centennial Aim, which was set before the Endeavor Societies of the brotherhood for realization by "Pittsburg, 1909," a year earlier than that date. If so, it will be a cause of great rejoicing. If we could report $10,00 by New Orleans, 1908, then we could go up to Pittsburg with $20,000 for the following year.

I am taking this opportunity to exhort all Endeavor members and officials to double vigilance and activity in our interest next Lord's Day, and I am asking all the pastors everywhere, that they give it an announcement from the pulpit and the weight of their influence to make it a great day.

Our brethren in the four great Rocky Mountain states embraced in the Inland Empire are few and feeble. We are in most instances weaker than other Protestant bodies. All the Protestant churches combined are not equal to the emergency of coping with sin in this vast territory. To save our friends, our scattered brethren, to evangelize this land for the Lord we must hear this TRUMPET CALL OF AMERICAN MISSIONS.

NEXT LORD'S DAY IS THE GREAT DAY OF ALL DAYS IN THIS INTEREST. May all the powers, high or low, in our brotherhood combine to make this day what the interests of the Lord's Kingdom demand.

H. A. DENTON,
Superintendent Y. P. Department, American Christian Missionary Socity.

BRIGHT PROSPECTS.

If the sentiment expressed in the following letter received in the office of the American Christian Missionary Society were carried out by our more than eight thousand churches, what glorious news we might be enabled to send in answer to the numerous appeals received constantly at the home office:

"Enclosed find draft for $42, the offering of the Woodlawn Church of Christ for American missions. We enjoy having a part in this great work of saving our country for Christ. This is only a mission church, but we want to firmly establish in it the missionary spirit, even though we have to sacrifice to do it.

"Hoping that this may achieve great good for the cause of Christ, and that the American Board may have the most prosperous year in its history, I am,

Yours in the salvation of America,
Clark W. Comstock."

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

To the Trustees of Eureka College in Regular Annual Meeting Assembled, Greeting:

Your Special Committee, appointed at the special session held in Peoria, March 12, 1908, for the purpose of investigating the teaching in the Biblical Department of Eureka College, submits the following report of its work, its findings and its recommendations:

I.—The Investigations.

The committee held six full sessions, besides several meetings of smaller groups for special work. March 31 the committee was organized at Bloomington and Brother A. J. Elliott was chosen secretary. By appointment the committee again assembled at Eureka, Monday, April 20, established headquarters at Lida's Wood, secured a stenographer, and began formal investigations.

First a statement was received from Prof. B. J. Radford, and a consultation over the same held with him on the lawn of his residence. All the students of the Biblical Department of the College, some 24 young men, were examined in order, a series of formulated questions covering all the ground of complaint obtainable being submitted to each, together with such other queries as the occasion demanded. Brother W. H. Cannon acted as inquistor. Also the several teachers in the Bible Department, and the president of the college were searchingly questioned. Besides these a number of former students, now ministers in the state were called in. Notice to ap-

FAMILY OF FIVE
All Drank Coffee From Infancy.

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems weakened by coffee drinking.

That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble.

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago.

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble.

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our eleven-year-old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved, and was given coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it.

"Long live the discoverer of Postum!"

pear was sent to every one known to have expressed objections to the college. The investigation covered two days and one night. Complete stenographic report of same is submitted herewith.

After this, letters were written to ministers and others, in Illinois and elsewhere, who, it was thought might give information on the subject. Copies of these letters, the list of names addressed, and the answers received are also tendered in evidence. Beyond this the committee made investigation as to the text books used in the Biblical Department, the credits given, and the character of the biblical and theological works introduced into the College Library.

The pastor of the Eureka Church, who has been acting as librarian of the college, was also before the committee. His statement as to his connection with the college, and his attitude in the present premises is appended to the stenographic report.

Since the gathering of information several sessions have been held in consultation over the drafting of the report herein presented. The last at Bloomington, May 12, in connection with the State Board meeting.

II.—Findings and Conclusions.

1. It should be noted that, in the several papers submitted by Prof. Radford, and in his article in the Christian Standard on "Why I Resigned" as interpreted by himself, as well as in his utterances to the committee, stenographically reported, no charge of false or dangerous teaching on the part of his colleagues in the Biblical Department of Eureka College is made.

There were two of the faculty who held membership in the Campbell Institute, and to the influence of this institute exerted through the utterances of "The Scroll" Brother Radford demurred. He felt that the dominance of that influence would have a tendency to nullify his own work. The courteous withdrawal of the said two members of the faculty from the said institute removes any such influence as far as it can be removed. The reasons assigned by these two members for their withdrawal from the Campbell Institute are embodied in the stenographic report of the investigation.

2. Our investigation leads us to the conclusion that there is not any radical or destructive criticism taught in the college, nor any sympathy there with German rationalism, or modern infidelity in any guise whatsoever. We believe that the Biblical Department, and the college as a whole, is in entire accord with the purposes of the founders thereof, that it faithfully teaches the Word of God, and worthily represents what is known as "our plea."

On the part of the entire ministerial body with one exception—probably the youngest member and one without any experience—the answers given to the question as to what is meant by "Our Plea" show a remarkable unity of idea and and definiteness of understanding of our historic position as a religious body. While each student answered in his own words, and so with varying pharseology, the idea was clear and correct in every instance.

3. We find the Bible Department, during the year just closing, was better equipped, better manned, offered a wider and more comprehensive course in preparation for the work of the Christian ministry, than ever before. It is not yet all that is to be desired; but it has only suffered in the general need of the college. The teachers have wrought well considering the support and the opportunities afforded them.

III.—Recommendations.

Growing out of the above investigations are some recommendations which the committee feel ought to be made to the Board of Trustees, and to the Christian Brotherhood of Illinois.

1. The further strengthening of the Bible Department, and a definite insistance upon a thorough literary course on the part of the student before taking up advanced biblical study. The committee is of the opinion that much of the complaint which has hitherto arisen from the ministerial student body, and through them been scattered abroad, has been the result of allowing undisciplined beginners to range through advanced biblical problems which require the discriminating faculties of the trained intellect. The careful grading of this department requires additional teachers.

2. We recommend on the part of the trustees and faculty that strict discipline be exercised over the students of the college with regard to their utterances concerning the institution; that all complaints arising amongst the students be submitted by them solely and only to the president or to such committee of the faculty as may be appointed to receive the same. That any student who is found to be spreading complaints and dissentions among his fellow-students, or to be carrying such to outside parties, be summarily dealt with. The sacred interests of our college must not be hazarded by hasty and unripe utterances of irresponsible pupils.

3. That the president's plan of inviting ministers, missionaries and distinguished Christian workers from our own brotherhood, and from without, to visit Eureka College for the holding of conferences, institutes and the giving of special addresses to the student body, be encouraged and fostered by every available means.

4. That the brotherhood of Illinois be insistently urged to furnish adequate support and encouragement to our college, especially at this hour of need and of opportunity. This is no time for our churches and ministers, or any one of either, to withdraw or to cut down financial aid to the college. Such a policy is not only ruinous to our educational interests, but is little less than downright treachery to the faithful, self-sacrificing, loyal men, who, with salaries so meagre as to scarcely provide a decent living in these days, and even with that unpaid for months at a time—take the raw recruites hardly won by their own earnest solicitation, and, through agony of prayer and labor of heart and brain, transform them into capable leaders for the churches.

Long enough has Eureka College, distinguished for eminent service to the general cause of Christ, been allowed to remain dependent for life upon the benefactions of a few local Disciples. Upon the slightest provocation a large contingency is aroused to criticism and to opposition, while through the years the almost despairing cries for help go unheeded. It is high time that offerings take the place of opposition, currency that of criticism and rallying that of ranting, while closed doors and closed pocket-books swing open with a liberality toward Christian education which shall be worthy of the name our people wear.

This report, together with all the papers, letters and documents to this investigation, is respectfuly submitted.

Cow vs. Milkman.—A Philadelphia lawyer maintains an admirable stock farm on the outskirts of the Quaker City. One day this summer some poor children were permitted to go over this farm, and when their inspection was done each one of them was given a glass of milk.

The milk came from a $2,500 cow.

"How do you like it, boys," asked an attendant, when the little fellows had drained their glasses.

"Fine! Fine!" said one youngster, with a grin of approval. Then, after a pause, he added:

"I wisht our milkman kept a cow."—Harper's Magazine.

NEW METHODS IN A BALTIMORE CHURCH.

In March I received a call to take up a work in Baltimore which was directly under the Home Mission Board. The work had been conducted with more or less success for ten years and just now is the crucial time. Its permanent success or failure depended, I was brought to feel, upon the next year's work. I resigned the work in Kansas City and came to Baltimore. The Official Board of the Boulevard Church presented me with $100 when I came away as an appreciation of the work I had tried to do while I was with them.

The work in Baltimore was known as the Fulton Avenue Christian Church. One of the first things we did was to change the name to Christian Center. The aim we have in mind is to make this church a center of Christian influence for all of Northwest Baltimore. Already we have begun a hearty canvass for new members. Practically all of the membership had slipped away, and it was like starting a new church. The building was not occupied by our people, but by the Baptists who had rented it, and given out that we had abandoned the field. In the last few weeks we have added 40 members, and by the time this is printed it will be 50.

The Christian Center idea we will hold prominently before us in all of our work. We are striving toward the Institutional Church. There is none within many miles, and the people who live about here are especially responsive to any attentions shown them as in the Institutional work. Already we have arranged to make our Center a branch of the Public Library. Then we have put in a branch of the Provident Savings Bank. This is a philanthropic enterprise which encourages the savings of children. Neither the library or bank make any money for the Center. Both cost us money, but they help reach the lives of the children and, in many cases, the parents.

We have now two Bible schools, one in the morning and one in the afternoon, and a good training for service class.

Other features will be added from time to time.

Baltimore is very responsive to our position. All who hear it and understand it are ready to accept it. There is a little timidity and some prejudice to overcome, but after all, the general body of people receive us more kindly and are more receptive than in many cities of our strength in the Middle West.

What we need at Christian Center is help enough to tide us over the next few years while we are gathering together our working force and bringing our plea before the people.

I cannot help but feel that within the next ten years, with good management, hard work and plenty of prayer, Baltimore will shelter ten churches of the Current Reformation, each one independent and self supporting with an equipment as complete as that now possessed by the Harlem Avenue Church or the Christian Temple.

We have started a Bible Institute for direct Scripture teaching. It is meeting with success. Many are interested, others are wondering. Through this Institute we will win many.

There is here, too, a Free Reading Room. We have just opened it and are in need of papers. We do not want old second-hand papers. The Baltimore people appreciate new papers and magazines as well as other folks.

Will you not, after reading this article, before you forget it, send us a check for a year's subscription to some of the current magazines? We have on our table, The Christian Century, Evangelist, and Standard, the Missionary Intelligencer, The American Home Missionary, and Collier's. We want subscriptions to Munsey, Century, Saturday Evening Post, Life, Puck, The American Boy, Ladies' Home Journal, Ainslee's, The Christian Herald, The Sunday School Evangel, The Sunday School Times, all of our Christian Church papers, The Youth's Companion and others. We can do a great work if you help us.

Important. In connection with our Bible Institute we are publishing a weekly paper, The Radius. We want this to reach everyone interested and we will send you a copy each week, without cost, if you will only send your name and address to us at once.

Nelson H. Trimble, Minister of Christian Center.

YONDER.

By Madge Teskey Crockett.

I wonder in that land to where
We march with quick'ning tread,
That country we so long to see,
And yet we somehow dread—
In that vast multitude untold
Beside the crystal sea,
Are we ordained to walk alone
Through all eternity?

I wonder shall that life reveal
The truth of heart and mind,
Or shall we wear a mask to hide
Our secret thoughts behind—
In sweet companionship unfold
A mete of heavenly bliss,
Or shall we be as lonely there
As we are now, in this?

I wonder shall lamented friends
Greet us with outstretched hands,
Or shall we drift in as one grain
Among quintillion sands—
To roam for aye without a goal,
Nor aught to mark the years,
A vagrant, disembodied soul
Adrift from joys or fears?

Away, all gloomy questioning!
Has not God's Word supplied
A promise sure, unchangeable:
"I shall be satisfied"?

Brother Carrick comes to us from the Congregational church, for which he has preached the past two years as opportunity was given him. He preached for the brethren here Sunday, June 7, and again June 21. He is now son-in-law to Elder J. A. Brennan, having recently been married to his youngest daughter. By her musical ability and love for the church work he will be greatly assisted by his wife. Churches in need of pastoral care may address him at Argenta, Ill., in care of Elder J. A. Brennan.

The church would bespeak for him the recognition due one of their number. He hopes soon to be regularly employed.

BUTLER COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

The fifty-third Annual Commencement of Butler was celebrated at Indianapolis, Thursday, June 18. The graduating class this year numbers twenty-three, of whom 8 are men and 15 women. Of the graduates the majority will take up the profession of teaching. Many will continue their studies in graduate schools. There are three ministerial students, all of whom have been engaged in the work of the ministry during the latter part of their college course. Of the ministerial students, Clay Trusty is pastor of the Seventh Christian Church, Indianapolis; Benjamin Smith, pastor of the church at Zionsville, Ind., and Claude M. Burkhart will reside in Indianapolis and preach at adjacent points. All of these young men give promise of great usefulness in their careers.

Owing to the affiliation of Butler College with the University of Chicago, which continues until 1910, the three graduates attaining the highest standing in their college courses are given scholarships entitling them to a year's tuition in the University of Chicago. The scholarships this year were awarded to Elmo Scott Wood, Hallie Gretchen Scotten and Eva May Lennes. The program of Commencement week was full of the usual pleasant re-unions and Commencement exercises. Final chapel exercises were held Friday, June 12. Baccalaureate sermon was preached Sunday, June 14, by Rev. Carey E. Morgan, who took as his theme "Abundant Life." Mr. Morgan is an alumnus of the class of '83, and his return after an absence of many years was one of the most pleasant features of Commencement week. The sermon was full of sentiment and poetry and was generally received as a most fitting message for a graduating class to take with it. The Philokurian banquet on Monday night was the occasion of the reunion of fifty-one former members of the society. The president's reception on Tuesday was largely attended by friends and relatives of the graduates and alumni of the college. The Class Day on Wednesday was signalized by the production of an original masque by Miss Charlotte Edgerton of the graduating class. The lines of the masque, which symbolized the striving of a poet for inspiration and the conflict between the heavenly muse and the earthly career, were graceful and vigorous, and surprisingly mature. It is thought that they will shortly be published.

This marks the end of the first year of President Howe's incumbency. Friends of the college feel that it has been a most successful year. The attendance at the college is gradually increasing the last three years, as shown by the number of the graduating class. Last year there were seventeen and this year twenty-three. Installments on the subscriptions to the endowment are being gradually paid in and it is hoped that the larger part of the endowment will be in the hands of the college by the end of next year. Few changes in the faculty are announced for next year, and everything betokens continued prosperity for the college.

CHRISTIAN TEMPLE SEMINARY.

The Christian Temple Seminary has just closed its fourth session. The Commencement exercises from June 14 to 18 were marked with interest from the baccalaureate service to the close of the commencement. The class day exercises on Monday and Wednesday evenings indicated talent and knowledge. Tuesday was field day and a handsome launch was tendered for the use of the Seminarians, which took us twenty miles below the city, where we spent the day. On the Commencement evening there were twelve graduates and two received additional seals on their diplomas as a reward for post-graduate work, which included the reading of sixteen books on missions, literature and in devotional literature.

The Seminary offers a three years' course in the study of the Scriptures, and last year there were one hundred and nineteen students. Next year promises a still larger enrollment. This course is taken by correspondence and the whole work is practically free. It is not so much seeking to make preachers and missionaries as it is to stimulate all to a larger knowledge of God as responsibilities of service in his church and out of it preachers and missionaries are going. The fifth session opens October 2.

He'n scrape de fiddle lak a born musicaner, an' for de banjo an' flute—lors! hit brings out de tears jes' ter lis'n. Does yo' know, sah," abruptly, "w'at I'se wukin' up hyer for?"

"To earn some money, I supose," I answered.

"Dat's hit, ezac'ly, sah. But I ain' need no money for housekeepin'. I raises gyarden truck, an' chickens, an' sich, an' I goes fishin' an' huntin'. No, sah! I'se gettin' money for, fer dat li'l' boy's musicianin'. He's plumb 'stracted 'bout an o'gin. I'se been totin' him up ter Mis' Hun'erford's lately, so 't he mout lis'n ter her playin'. An' fer a fac' sah, dat li'l' boy jes' cock his head on one side whilst she played a chune, den he'd climb up on dat stool an' play the same chune right smack frou, every dot an' skiver ezac'. Mis' Hun'erford 'low 't was truly 'stonishin'. Yes, sah! dat boy gwine hab an o'gin, an I'se gwine hab him learn play jes' lak white fo'ks, off'n paper."

At this moment the rear man came up and stood waiting for orders. Jock ducked his head and was turning away, when I called him back. Unclasping the glittering chain from my watch, I handed it to him.

"Give it to the little boy," I said, "and tell him it is from one of his daddy's friends."

Jock's face grew radient. A present for himself would not have given him half the pleasure.

The next week my chief sent instructions for me to repair to Terrebone and survey some swamp lands. I had been there before, and knew the place well. In the winter it would not have been so bad, but now! I crushed the brief note impatiently in my hand. But there was no help for it, so we set about breaking camp. The next day we were ready for departure.

As we stood on the platform of the little way-station, waiting for the train, I saw the big, well-known figure of Jock hurrying up the track. In a few moments he stood beside me.

"Clar' for hit, boss; I war 'feared I wouldn't cotch up!" he panted. "I'se mof' run de bref outen me."

I welcomed him heartily. His broad shoulders and knowledge of woodcraft would be invaluable in that out-of-the-way place. The terms of his service were quickly arranged, and then I asked him about the little boy.

"I dunno for shore yet, sah," he said gravely. "De doctor 'low he war in bad fix, an' better be sent up Norf to a gran' hospital. He 'low de boy cayn't nebber be raised lak he is, but dat maybe de big doctors mout unwin' de twistes, an' fix him lak udder boys. Ef dey do dat," with a rare smile, "I'll shorely t'ank de good Lawd all de res' ob my life."

"It will be very expensive," I ventured.

A faint whistle in the distance announced the approaching train. I hastily gathered up my kit, and stood waiting.

It was night when we reached Thibodeaux. The next day we purchased provisions, and set out for the scene of our labors. Three months later I received instructions to cross over into Texas. It was spring before we returned to Florida.

"He's done cured!" he cried radiantly. "All de twistes an' disj'ints tuk outen him. He's a comin' home now, walkin' from de kyars lak udder boys. Glory ter de Lam'! WAITING.

"I will go and work for my King," I cried,
"There are so many ways on every side."
But my feet could not reach the open door,
And I heard a voice whisper, "Try no more,
Rest quietly on this bed of pain,
Strength for some other day to gain."
And my heart was filled with dark despair,
For how could I serve my Master there?
While I lay idle day by day
Those chances to work would slip away.
Then slowly the darkness lifted, and lo!
Again came the whisper, solft and low,
"When they cease to murmur against their fate,
They also serve who only wait."

IN THE SHADOW.

(To V. L B.)

What though it be in the shadow
My lot in life is cast,
Apart from the great world's knowing?
This cheers me; that at last
The Master will speak approval
And bid my heart find rest.

Not for the world's applauding
Do I, O Master, pray.
This be my prayer unceasing:
That each departing day
Shall leave me somewhat farther
Along the heav'nly way!

Reds and Blues Contest Buttons

REDS AND BLUES Contest plans have proved wonderfully successful in Y. M. C. A. work and are proving more so in Sunday school work. By making use of our Reds and Blues plans you can easily double your school membership in a month or six weeks. You can break up irregular attendance in a very short time. You can raise large sums of money for your needs. You can secure church attendance, bringing of lesson helps, bringing of collection, coming on time.

The Reds and Blues plans please because they set everybody at work heartily and enthusiastically and because each leaves the school in a healthy condition when the contest is ended.

Each Reds and Blues plan requires dividing the school into two sections—Reds and Blues and appointing captains, one or more, for each side, a social or other treat to be given at the close of the contest, when those on the winning side receive ice-cream and cake, and the losers crackers and cheese, or some other attraction to celebrate the close of the contest and the victory. That is to be paid for by the school. Complete instructions sent with each order.

Price, in lots of 10 or more (sent assorted, one-half each color), 1½c each, postpaid; 60 or more, 1c each, postpaid.

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ. by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo, cloth, 140 pages, net, postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real may come to fruition that these ch s are given their present form."

Early Views and Separation of Baptist and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo cloth, gold side and back stamp, $ A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

Do not fear the terror of the truth, so as to step aside from under it and withdraw thyself from the stroke of it; but think of the goodness of it, as a man, though he fear the bitterness of the pill, yet knowing that it is a means of his health, he is willing to take it. So here, when God moves, move thou; when he stirs, stir thou.

THE OLD DEAR WAY.

There's a road I will not take,
Though the lark's above it,
The sweet dews love it:
Never again, for Mary's sake.

There's a house I've loved and lost,
From garden bowers,
At the midnight hours,
It cries to me like a lonely ghost.

An old red house, so warm and kind,
Yet I must shun it,
Nor think upon it,
The thought of the stranger's in my mind.

Your garden's out in bloom and fruit;
Empty and cold,
Where we walked of old;
Never again shall I come to it.

There are thoughts I keep apart
Of the darling faces
The empty places,
Locked forever within my heart.

A FIRST LESSON IN DIPLOMACY.

The state superintendent of public schools of Maine recently recalled a story of his early school life, which the Kennebec Journal prints. He distinctly remembered, he said to an audience of Maine "schoolma'ams," his first day in school. It was also his brother's first day, and they occupied seats across the aisle from each other.

It was in the afternoon when the young and pretty teacher came to my seat, placed her hand on my shoulder and asked, "Don't you love me?"

I was almost frightened out of my wits, but I managed to look up at her.

"No, ma'am," I replied.

She then went to my brother, directly across the aisle, and asked him the same question, to which he replied:

"Yes, ma'am."

You may readily imagine which of us got the raisins from the pudding during that term of my school. All that I got I pounded out of my brother.

I forthwith made up my mind that whenever that question was asked me again I would always reply:

"Yes, ma'am."

WOODLOTS IN JAPAN.

In these times of great drains on the timber supply, caused by the heavy demand for forest products of all kinds, Americans may see in Japan an example of what can be done in growing wood on small plots. That country contains twenty-one million woodlots, about three-fourths of which belong to private persons and one-fourth to communes.

The average size of the plots is less than nine-tenths of an acre. They usually occupy the steepest, roughest, poorest ground. In this way land is put to use which would otherwise go to waste, and if unwooded would lose its soil by the wash of the dashing rains.

From Japan's woodlots the yearly yield of lumber is about 88 feet, board measure, per acre, and three-fourths of a cord of firewood. In many cases the yield is much higher. More than half a billion trees are planted yearly to make up what is cut for lumber and fuel. Assessment for taxation is low, averaging for the twenty-one million lots less than a dollar an acre.

With all the care in cutting, and the industry in re-planting it is by no means certain that Japan's forests are holding their own. If the preservation of the forests is doubtful there, it is evident that depletion must be alarmingly rapid in other countries which cut unsparingly and plant very little. On the other hand, it is encouraging to see what can be done with rough, steep and poor land. The United States has enough of that kind, without touching the rich, agricultural acres, to grow billions of feet of lumber.

EDITORIAL

EVANGELISM—OF WHAT SORT?

It is a hopeful sign that the churches are beginning to take inventory of the different types of evangelistc work and to make up their minds that some are necessary and others harmful. The Disciples of Christ have been from the first ardent believers in the work of the preacher of the gospel. They began their history with the evangelistic spirit and have flourished by its continuance. Though the Campbells were not men of the sort who would pass by the name of evangelists, yet their strongest co-laborers were of that order. Scott, Stone, the Haydens and many more of the first and second generations were gifted in winning men to the cross.

It is unnecessary therefore to discuss the question as to whether the Disciples believe in evangelism. When they cease to believe in it they will cease to believe in the Great Commission. But they wish to know what is meant by evangelism, and what types of this activity are valuable and what are harmful in the work of the churches. The fathers of this movement were keen critics of the popular evangelism of their day. They believed as fully then in the preaching of the gospel as does any man of this generation. But they saw the evils that resulted from an indiscriminate and emotional evangel, and they sought to warn their brethren against such results. It would seem that in not a little of the work of protracted meetings conducted in our churches in this generation we have fallen into the very excesses which the fathers deemed unfaithful to the Scriptures and fatal to the sound life of the church. We wish to point out some of the features in which this evangelism sometimes seen in our congregations presents the most direct affront to all the teachings of the fathers and of the New Testament. In so doing we are fully aware that not one of our workers in this field would wish to be untrue to the gospel of the cross, nor to those principles by which the Disciples have been guided in most of their history. We believe that such departures as are seen in the work of any one of them have crept in under the spur of ambition to do the greatest good, and to bring the largest number to Christ. None the less we believe that certain elements of present-day evangelism as seen at times in our churches exhibit all the worst features of the denominational revivals which our earlier preachers did so much to discourage.

We have no space here to comment upon objectionable features in the conduct and preaching of the evangelist himself. In what is here said it may be taken for granted that personally and in his behavior he is all that could be desired. Our comments are entirely upon the consequences of the passion for results which sacrifices all other things to the number of additions to be secured in a meeting. We freely grant that the churches like this type of results. It is undoubtedly true that the numerical success of some evangelistic work has produced in many minds the feeling that a meeting is a failure which does not sound well in telegraphic reports. Even pastors who know the evil results of this passion are carried away by the opinion of the church and permit, even encourage, such efforts.

The first result of such a meeting upon the community is to produce the impression that the church is begging for new members at any price. Instead of lifting the standard of the faith so as to make men respect the church as an organization demanding of its members a sacrificial, holy and serious life, for which struggle with sin, self-denial and lofty consecration are demanded, much of the popular evangelism of the day degrades the church in the public mind by making it a mendicant at the door of the community, coaxing, begging, scaring, or attempting to play upon the emotions until thought is lost in feeling, and by any and all means people are gotten in the church. It takes a long time for the cause to live down this cheapening experience in any community.

Another result of the same process is the type of church membership which many of the churches reveal. People who come into the church on the wave of revivalism which leaves little time for reflection, and makes little demand upon the conscience and life are of very little value to the church after they have once entered. Our brotherhood has a large percentage of shifting, floating membership, which easily attached itself to the church in revivals, and as easily goes its own way afterward, or becomes useless timber in the structure of the church, to weaken the whole edifice by its untrained and undependable nature. To be sure a church that is alert, vigorous and ready can do much in the training of such raw recruits. But a church that depends upon a meeting to solve the annual problem is in most cases weakened rather than strengthened by the experience. It is abnormal for a multitude of children to be born into a family at one time.

But perhaps the most regrettable, if not immoral feature of some of the evangelism of the day is the invasion of the Sunday school, even the primary departments, with such forms of solicitations as leave little children no choice but a hurried and emotional conformity to the demands of the revivalist without regard to preparation or propriety. Not infrequently has it occurred that the evangelist has counted upon such a "rounding up" of little children from the school as the first "visible results" of the meeting. It need hardly be said that the younger classes of the Bible school are the very last places in which an evangelist should ever be permited to intrude. Teachers and parents ought to resist such a violation of child nature and such interruption of the normal and beautiful entrance of the child into the church as they would resist the forcible abduction of a child from the home. The maturer members of the school may well be expected to attend any special meetings the church may hold, and to be among the most prepared of those who attend. But little children from seven to twelve ought to be protected from any interference with their natural growth into Christian life under the loving and regular ministries of their parents, teachers and pastor. "Decision Day," if used with restraint and good judgment, is a valuable feature of the school life. But nothing more than this ought ever to be permitted in the Bible school.

We are pointing out in this matter some of the dangers to the church that grow out of an extreme and unwarranted type of evangelism such as the fathers of this reformation would have viewed with stern disapproval. We believe it to be characteristic of very few of our evangelists. Were it to become common, we should be concerned for the future of the churches. We do not believe that our evangelists who are doing the most permanent and substantial work are likely to bring such results upon the churches which they assist. There are evangelists and evangelists. The churches have seemed to be fascinated for a time with a type of work which magnifies mathematics and misses the most vital elements of church edification. There are many signs that this tide of emotion and number-getting is passing. A demand is being heard on all sides for a more constructive, biblical and enduring work.

For such an evangelism there is increasing demand. We need an order of men who shall devote themselves to it. Fortunately there are many such already doing noble work today. Indeed there are very few against which the reproach we have named can lie. Therefore we deprecate any effort to put the evangelists into a class by themselves, to band them together into a professional trade-union, and to see them over against the pastors as a class demanding special privileges or needing to combine against a common enemy. It may be regarded as a shrewd business plan of certain types of journalism to exploit the evangelists by attempting to create the impression that they are a separate order and must hold conventions or "congresses" of their own for the promotion of their profession. But evangelists can never be put into one class, and the vagaries and special methods of the few who have departed from the spirit and purposes of the New Testament and our own people can never be the characteristics of the enduring evangelism either among us or elsewhere.

The work which is most needed today in all our churches is that of an evangelism which directs its attention less to the adding of numbers to the church membership than the preparation of the church to add to its numbers daily and weekly throughout the year such as are being saved; it regards the strengthening of the church as its first duty rather than the ingathering of fresh recruits; it understands that an invalid mother can neither bear nor care for healthy children; it understands what the Disciples have always taught, and what the Christian world is just beginning to recognize, that conversion is not normally a spasm of emotion but a deepening conviction which comes to expression in quiet self-commitment to Christ; that what most people require is instruction far beyond the limits of an ordinary revival; and that any attempt to violate the normal development of little children into Christian character is unnatural and immoral.

We shall need more evangelism rather than less in the future. There is no disposition to underestimate its value or to disprize its helpful results. We need to have a host of men who devote themselves to the work, not because they are unable or unwilling to be pastors, but because they can serve the cause more effectively by evangelistic labors. But of certain types of evangelism we have enough, and quite enough. A great meeting is a blessing if the church is able to conserve its results. Otherwise it is a curse. Not a few churches have never recovered from what was thought to be a successful revival. But the greatest menace to the churches today is the unprepared, untrained and untrainable material which has come in at such times and makes the work of the pastor difficult if not impossible, the work of the church slow and ineffective, and gives a false impression of the Christian life.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The preliminary draft of the program for the Congress of Baptists, Disciples, and Free Baptists, to be held in this city in November, is now completed, and promises a rich feast to those who attend. The general themes selected for treatment include the following, "Does the New Testament Contemplate the Church as an Institution?"; "What are the Legitimate Limits of Free Speech in a Republic?"; "The Doctrine of the Atonement in terms of Modern thought"; "What Definite Steps Should be Taken for the Immediate Union of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples of Christ?"; "Is Pyscho-Therapeutics a Function of the Church?", and "Christ's Prayer for Unity." The date of the Congress is November 10-12, and the sessions will probably be held in the Memorial Church of Christ, the congregation recently formed by the union of the Memorial Baptist and the First Christian Churches.

Preparations are going forward to make the coming State Convention of the Disciples in Chicago worthy of the brotherhood in the state and in this city. The opening sessions will be held in the Memorial Church of Christ, as better suited to the gatherings of the C. W. B. M. than a larger hall. The Convention will later use the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. on La Salle street, as the place of its meetings. The Palmer House has been chosen as the headquarters of the Convention, where delegates will be registered, committees will meet, and parlors will be at the service of the Convention. The churches of this city, and especially the Business Men's Association, are working earnestly to promote the success of the gathering. An urgent invitation is extended to all Disciples who can make attendance upon the Convention part of their program for August 31—September 3, to visit the State Convention of Illinois.

The death of Mr. Cleveland removes from American life the only ex-President of the republic. For the entire period of his public life and during his retirement to the quieter scenes of Princeton, Mr. Cleveland maintained the character of a high-minded citizen, whose first concern was the welfare of the country. Though differing widely from the leaders of his party in matters of policy during the past few years, no man was held in greater honor by the people at large. He was known as one who held his own way in spite of all opposition, to whom the honor of the nation was far above every selfish interest, and who had a way of expressing himself in the clearest and most forcible English ever used by a chief executive of the nation. He believed that his party, and in a measure the entire nation, had fallen upon unhappy times. But his optimism was well expressed in the last utterance he ever made in this city, on the anniversary of Washington's birthday in 1907, when he said:

"If we find that the wickedness of destructive agitators and the selfish depravity of demagogues have stirred up discontent and strife where there should be peace and harmony and have arrayed against each other interests that should be in hearty co-operation; if we find that the old standards of sturdy, uncompromising American honesty have become so corroded and weakened by a sordid atmosphere that our people are hardly startled by crime in high places and shameful be-

Children and the Kingdom

George B. Van Arsdall.

It is often asked how early in life should the child be allowed or encouraged to come into the church. The answer commonly given is, not until they understand what they are doing, which, being interpreted, means that they have some reasonable appreciation of the significance of such a step. A true observation concerning the matter is that no definite age can be assigned as a time at which the child ought to come into the church. Children develop very differently.

But what is meant by the child understanding the significance of such a step? If by it is meant the comprehension of theological doctrines, then the child is not a fit subject for church membership. In fact, if such a requirement is made, practically everybody except the preachers would be excluded. This does not mean that theological teaching has not its value, but the significance of the whole idea of God, and for that matter of life itself, is a thing of growth. With some perhaps it never comes to have any large and worthful value. The acceptance of Christ and putting him on in obedience, cannot be made in any other than an artificial way to mean the same thing to all people. The confession of faith which each one makes may be couched in the same language, and the method of baptism and the formula used in administering it the same in each case, and yet each one must of necessity put into it what it signifies to his own religious experience. And whatever it signifies, if the life grows in Christ, it will come in later years to have a more profound meaning to the individual than it had at the time of its first statement. The child's acceptance of Christ cannot possibly be forced into the same meaning to the child that it has to the man. Therefore, if we mean by the child understanding what it does, or the significance of the step, that a child should put a man's thought into it, then there is no place at all for a child in the church. The child cannot have a man's thought without abnormal development. But the acceptance of Christ ought to mean something to the child, and it ought to mean all that the child mind is capable of comprehending. If it does, it will mean relatively just as much to the child as the same thing will mean to the man.

What are some of the benefits of the child's early acceptance of Christ? In the first place, it is wholesome, because it is the normal result of Christian teaching in the home and the Bible school. The conversion of one in mature years is in itself a recognition of at least a partial failure in the normal development of the individual. The acceptance of Christ by the child is not so much a conversion in the sense of turning away from that which is wrong as it is a confirmation of a process of development which is reached at a time when definite commitment to a course of life is taken. This is the real significance of the child coming into the church. It is not a thing of any particular theological value to the child, and it is certainly not a remorseful repentance of past sins. It is rather that the child has been instructed in sacred things and sacred obligations, and now it comes to give its approval of and commitment to them.

Again, the early commitment of the life to Christ saves the individual from the shock of distinct breaking with an unworthy past. The further we advance in life the more we become conscious of our imperfections and failures, and this consciousness accentuates the contrast between the actual in the individual life and the ideal in the Christian life to such an extent as often to render very difficult the task of making a new beginning.

Another advantage of the early commitment of the life to Christ is a very strong and distinct help in molding the character of the child. However slightly it may affect the young mind, it is nevertheless true that such a commitment does become, in some measure, both an ideal and a restraining force in the life of the child.

There are two extremes in the attitude of parents toward this matter, one is that of an overpressure to induce the child to come into the church, while the other is a discouragement of any such step on its part. Would it not be much better if parents would frankly express to their children their desire and hope that they might early in life become Christians? This should not be made a matter of such great urgency as to either compel the child, or form in them an aversion to the whole matter, but a genuine, frank and heartfelt interest in it, with such encouragement as parents understand their child will most appreciate and use. Such interest and encouragement will generally result in a free, normal and healthy action on the part of the child at its own initiative. It hardly seems to us to be the part of the highest wisdom to say, "I will leave the matter entirely with the child." In all other matters of importance, even where we expect the child to make its own choice, we do not hesitate to express our opinions and give encouragement, and the same thing, it would seem, should be done in regard to the matter of church membership.

CHRISTIAN UNION

Errett Gates.

No apology need be made for opening a department of Christian Union in the pages of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY. This paper as consistently stood for the principles of Christian union as the originating motive, the continuously guiding mission, and the ever-present obligation of the Disciples of Christ. Not in theory but in practice it has tried to hasten the coming of unity among the people of God. It has urged on and has joined in every movement that had in view the closer relations of the various religious bodies. It has rejoiced in the constantly increasing interest in Christian union in all the churches.

The purpose of this new department is to concentrate attention upon this deeply significant modern movement. Above all other themes it ought to concern the Disciples of Christ. They can not afford to ignore or to be ignorant of any event, utterances or publication that has to do with the movement or the problem of Christian union.

Nearly one hundred years have passed since the Disciples began to preach the obligation of Christ's followers to answer his prayer for unity. The Christian world has learned much during this century concerning the mind of Christ. The Disciples have not remained untouched by this new knowledge.

The unification of Christendom is a world movement. No great religious event is wholly without bearing upon the problem. Such events will receive notice here.

Special attention will, however, be given to the widely discussed movement for the union of Baptists and Disciples. In this the Disciples are brought face to face, not with a theory, but with a condition of things which calls for immediate action. Events have already taken place which herald a new era in the relationship between Baptists and Disciples. To record the events in this movement and the utterances of Baptists and Disciples concerning it, will be the special task of this department.

The editor of this department will welcome questions and inquiries upon any phase of the subject. He will also be glad to receive information as to local efforts to unite churches, and all news items bearing in any way upon the co-operation and unification of the various denominations.

The first event that falls to be noticed is the union that has been consummated between the First Christian Church and the Memorial Baptist Church of Chicago, under the leadership of Dr. Herbert L. Willett. There were many local conditions that made this union desirable and advantageous to both congregations, but these alone would not have effected the union. The historic relations of Baptists and Disciples and their close resemblance in faith and practice made the union practicable. But the decisive consideration, the ruling motive that piloted the two congregations through all the negotiations was the obligation they felt to answer Christ's prayer for the unity of his followers. They were convinced that they were pleasing Christ. They have tried as best they could to please their brethren at large on both sides, and to consult the general interests of both bodies; but the pleasure of Christ in their undertaking was more to them than the pleasure of men. They made sure that they were right and then went ahead. All local difficulies and differences were marvelously smoothed out of the way; they did not expect to solve all difficulties of a general sort.

This union is the most significant event that has happened in the more recent approach of the Baptists and Disciples toward each other. Where there have been other unions of local Baptist and Christian church, as at Moneal, Wisconsin, and the half dozen in Canada; but this is the most representative to the present time, and will doubtless give encouragement to many long contemplated unions throughout the country. The honored position of the Memorial Baptist Church among the Baptists in Chicago and the distinguished position of the minister of the united church among the Disciples, make this union in every way a momentous event.

DENIED OR GRANTED.

Now which of these holds hardest pain,
Most grievous is to bear—
The joy we crave and never have,
Or the curse of a granted prayer?
The baffled wish or the bitter rue?
Must we then choose between the two?

O will of God, thou blessed will,
Which, like a heavenly air,
The breath of souls around us rolls,
And wraps us everywhere,
Giving with its divine caress
All healing and all tenderness.

Then, though the time seem long,
Made one with thee, it cannot be
That we shall suffer wrong;
And,whether granted or denied,
Our heart's wish shall be satisfied.

SERMONIC PARAGRAPHS.

HUGH WAYT.

"Pure religion and undefiled" has both external and internal qualities.

Some people expect the preacher to damn his own soul by not saying anything to fit them.

The ministers' best efforts to do good among his parishioners is often like putting a poultice on a wooden leg.

Sorghum-molasses would never be good if the green skimmings were not removed. Some churches never do any good till the pestilential fellows are dismissed.

Many children between the ages of 25 and 75, by their actions say, "If it don't go our way we will take our playthings and go home."

Cattle eat the hay and let the weeds and thistles alone. Many people pick out the weeds and thistles, and let the good things in the sermon go to waste.

Are Ministers' Sons Necessarily Bad?

Jessie Brown Pounds.

The badness of ministers' sons is proverbial. One might sometimes suppose, from the current speech concerning them, that they were quite generally given over to shop-lifting or sheep-stealing. Happily, however, history is full of facts which tend to give us a more hopeful view.

John and Charles Wesley were preachers' sons, but they did not escape the rigors of family discipline on this account. Nineteen children came to the home of Samuel and Susannah Wesley, and it was necessary to have method in their training. The Wesley children were taught to eat three meals a day and no more, to fear the rod, and to cry under their breath if cry they must. When a child reached the age of five years he was allowed one day in which to learn the alphabet, and woe be to the little Wesley who failed to complete his task within this time. No wonder that the people led by the son of this household were called "Methodists!" The order and system which characterize modern Methodism were learned in the Epworth parsonage.

Jonathan Edwards, the theological genius of America, and his son, Jonathan Edwards the younger, came of long lines of preachers. Henry Ward Beecher, the prince of American pulpit orators, never failed to acknowledge his debt to that New England parsonage presided over by Lyman Beecher and his lovely wife, Roxana.

Schleirmacher, the German philosopher and theologian, whose masterpiece is said to have no equal outside of Calvin's "Institutes," was the son of a Lutheran clergyman. So was Karl Ullman, another German theologian whose life was as noble as his work. So was Schelling. These were good men and true, though their philosophy is sometimes rather confusing to those who try to think big German thoughts with small American heads.

Ludwig Harms, the beloved missionary pastor of Hermannsburg, was the son of a clergyman, and began his public life as his father's assistant.

John Owen, one of the great religious leaders under the commonwealth, was the son of a clergyman. John Neale, preacher, poet and translator, was another preacher's son whose piety equalled his brilliancy.

Dean Alford and Dean Stanley, two of the noblest of teachers in the Church of England, were clergymen's sons. Charles Kingsley, poet, preacher, naturalist, novelist, sociologist and Dean of Westminster, began life in the vicarage of Holne. In his youth, skepticism took hard hold upon him, but he wrestled with it and at length overcame. About the time of his graduation he wrote in his note-book, "To-night, under the stars of heaven, I have given myself to God, in a consecration which, if He gives me the faith I pray for, shall never be withdrawn." To that consecration and to his early training he was most nobly true.

William Tennant, the Irish-born preacher who, near the beginning of the last century, did such great service to the Presbyterian Church in the United States, had four sons, all of whom chose and honored their father's calling.

Francis Wayland, who has been classed as an educator with Arnold of Rugby, was another preacher's son of whom no father need have been ashamed.

Alexander Campbell was the honored son of an honored father, a teacher and leader who owned at all times the teacher and leader who had prepared the way for his work.

Many of the sons of preachers have found their way to heathen lands. Mills, Judson and Mackay were of this number.

Many have served the world nobly in fields not distinctively religious. Literature, for instance, owes an incalculable debt to the preacher's home. How could we have spared Addison, or Goldsmith, or Cowper, or Coleridge, or Tennyson? How could we have spared Emerson, or Holmes, or Lowell?

The popular prejudice seems to be against preachers' sons rather than against preachers' daughters. Yet, since both may be supposed to have the same training it is interesting to remember that some of the world's rarest women have been daughters of the manse. Miss Austen and the Bronte sisters, Mrs. Stowe and Mrs. Phelps-Ward among novelists, Miss Steele, Mrs. Barbauld, Mrs. Prentiss and Miss Havergal among poets and hymn-writers, Sister Dora and Mary Carpenter among philanthropists —these are only a few of the many.

How came the popular prejudice against ministers' sons? Perhaps it is because of the fact that ministers are able to distinguish between horse-play and sin. It may be that mere frolicsomeness is more leniently dealt with by ministers and their wives than by parents of more irritable tempers and less moral discrimination. Certainly none can be firmer than the typical preacher and his wife in dealing with real wrongdoing.

But no matter whence the prejudice comes, if there is no foundation for it. And there is none.

In The Minister's Study

Ray Davis.

"Robert, will you please let baby come into the study while I go to market? Katie is ironing, and doesn't want him in the kitchen."

Mrs. Barrows seated their son and heir on the floor with a pile of picture-books, and closed the door behind her. Baby was delighted to be admitted to the forbidden room, but decided to cast an eye over the picture books before beginning an exploring tour.

Meantime, the Rev. Robert Barrows took up his pencil and looked blankly at the wall—what was that idea he was just going to put down? Next Sunday was the anniversary of the organization of the parish, and he wanted to write an especially impressive sermon. He had selected as his text, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid," and it was written, bold and black at the top of his paper. The sermon was already blocked out, but he intended to use his notes, and so could give more care and polish to the diction—he prided himself on the purity of his English.

The fugitive idea was just creeping back into his consciousness when he felt himself grasped firmly about the knees, and realized that his son and heir had exhausted the resources of literature. A quick move of his foot upset the waste basket, which he trusted might furnish a diversion until he had that idea on paper; but the same quick motion also upset the heir apparent, and some valuable time was lost in restoring peace.

By that time, the reverend gentleman had decided that some poet had expressed the same idea better than he could—what poet was that? Or was it in a magazine poem? If he could only recall the name of the author it would be easy to locate the poem. It was last summer he read that poem—the telephone bell!

"Yes, this is Mr. Barrows. Your pew? —the ushers have charge of the seating and you had better see them about it. Yes—I can look up the other matter for you now." Then followed a long search in his desk, the result of which was duly reported, and the telephone receiver hung up.

After rescuing a pet volume from the clutches of his son, the Rev. Mr. Barrows took up his pencil, and, after some reflection, decided to pass on to the next division of his sermon. He had outlined this division, in which he wished to introduce a flowery description of the music of the heavenly choir, as "the final harmonious resolution of all earth-born dissonances." It was a subject which appealed strongly to his poetic nature, and he had the sentences just right in his mind, when Katie knocked at the study door.

"Please, Mr. Barrows, the coal man is here, and wants you to fix that bin down cellar so he can dump it in."

Robert Barrows loathed coal-bins, and the shock from the celestial music was trying to his nerves, but he managed to convince the man that he could put in the coal without clerical aid.

He had returned to his study, and was seating himself at his desk when the front door-bell rang, and a member of the St. Agnes Guild wished him to tell Mrs. Barrows that she would rather bring hickory-nut cake and cream to the church tea; so, would she please get somebody else to furnish the potato salad.

Robert Barrows carefully wrote this mes-

Lesson VIII, The Old Testament.

H. L. Willett

The Old Testament comprises the total surviving literature of the Hebrew people in the classic period, while the Hebrew language was still in use. It includes thirty-nine books. It was written almost wholly in Hebrew, a part of Daniel and a single verse in Jeremiah alone being in Aramaic. It is the body of Scriptures held sacred by the Jewish people of the present age. It was first called the "Old Testament" by the early church fathers to distinguish it from the Christian writings which they called the "New Testament."

The books of the Old Testament were produced during a period of more than five hundred years, from the times of the earliest prophetic books like Amos and Hosea to the close of the Old Testament canon, about 160 B. C. But some of the books contain materials much older, dating from the earlier ages of the national history, and preserved either in oral or written form. These were incorporated by the writers and compilers of the books as we now have them.

The earliest fragments of Hebrew literature are the songs in celebration of the experiences of the desert wanderings and the settlement in Canaan. Such are the Song of the Well, Num. 21:17, 18; the Song of Triumph, Ex. 15; the Song of Deborah, Jud. 5, and other fragments like Jotham's Fable, Jud. 9, Samson's Riddles, Jud. 14: 14, 18; 15:16, and popular proverbs like 1 Sam. 10:11, 12; 24:13. These, like much more of the national memorials, were probably preserved orally for many generations before they were committed to writing. When the work of writing down the records of the past and the utterances of the present was begun, in the schools of the prophets and elsewhere, these early fragments were embedded in the narratives thus produced.

The Jews of Jesus' day divided their Scriptures into the Law, the Psalms and the Prophets (Luke 24:44). By the Law they meant the Five Books or Penteteuch, which they attributed to Moses, and held to be of the greatest sanctity. The Psalms, as they used the term in this connection, included not only our Book of Psalms, but the miscellaneous writings of the Old Testament such as were not included in the Law and the Prophets. This collection took its name from the Psalms, which came first in it. The Prophets included both the prophetic histories like Judges and Samuel, which they called the "Earlier Prophets," but the utterances of the great prophets gathered into the books which bear their names, like Isaiah, Amos and Nahum. These they called the "Later Prophets."

A better classification of the books of the Old Testament divides them into the following groups: 1. The Prophetic Histories, 2. The Prophetic Messages, 3. The Devotional and Elegiac Writings, 4. The Wisdom Books, 5. The Legal Books, 6. The Priestly Histories, 7. The Apocalypses.

Literature. Hazard-Fowler, "The Books of the Bible with Relation to their Place in History;" McFadyen, "Introduction to the Old Testament;" Batten, "The Old Testament from the Modern Point of View;" Sanders and Fowler, "Outlines of Old Testament History and Literature."

Questions.

1. What writings does the Old Testament comprise? 2. From what period do these writings come? 3. What are the earliest portions of the Old Testament? 4. What was the Jewish division of the Old Testament? 5 What is the classification which best explains its parts?

What Shall We Do With The Christian Endeavor

O. E. Tomes.

The important question is, not what to do with Christian Endeavor, but what to do with the boys and girls who are growing into young men and women. The future of the society, as a society, is of no consequence; but the future of the young people means much to the church and everything to themselves. Institutions and organizations come and go, but life is eternal. We may speak with levity of these organizations, but when dealing with life we must be in earnest. "He that hath the Son hath the life. He that hath not the Son of God hath not the life." Our work is before us. We must bring the young people to Christ that Christ may live in them.

Let us look back over the twenty-five years of the history of this movement, not to recount the accomplishments, for they are well known and appreciated, but to find, if possible, the real heart of the movement to get clearly before us the Christian Endeavor idea.

The society was born out of evangelistic fervor. It came not at a time when the spiritual life of the church was at low ebb. It was not an attempt primarily to arouse or stir. But it followed a revival in the local church, when many young people had taken up a new allegiance. They loved Christ. Mr. Clark knew, as we know, that love must find expression or be lost. Here was the need. And subsequent history has led many to say that the hand of providence was in the shaping of events.

With the above view of the genesis of the first society it is not surprising that the life of the movement has centered very largely in the prayer meeting. Herein the love of the young people for Christ found expression. Their Christian experience became more real to them because of their attempt to voice it, just as an idea becomes more distinct to us as we put it into language. It is admitted that this experience was often shallow, that it was overdrawn in the expression at times and repressed at others, that there was some of cant, some of hypocrisy, no one will deny, but the tares grow with the wheat. There was that which to them was true, deep and heartfelt. There were stammerings, forgettings, quakings, failures, victories, but withal, growth.

Primarily these prayer meetings were for inspiration, rather than instruction—for practice, for prayer. They were devotional and for these reasons helpful and wholesome.

Just here let us question whether we have departed from this ideal. Personally, I believe that we must do so in a measure, but not in the way and to the extent to which we have gone.

We have gotten away from the freshness of the prayer meetings of the earlier days wherever we have allowed the meeting to be predominated by those who have lost the enthusiasm of new experiences in Christ. The prayer meeting in many places has become as dry, full of religious cant, and uninteresting, as would be possible were the meeting planned with this one purpose.

Another cause for diminished enthusiasm and aggressiveness is that the leadership has been assumed, and continues to be assumed, by those who by reason of years of experience are supposed to be the best able to do the work. It is natural that it should be so. It is the line of the least resistance. The society takes it unless some force enters to determine otherwise. Here is where the wise minister shows his wisdom. The apprentice in the trade does not, can not, learn by observation alone. He learns to do by doing. The work is not so well done probably, but another worker is being trained. The officers of the Christian Endeavor Society and the burden of the committee work, in direction as well as accomplishment, should be given to the younger members of the society.

That the work of the society is largely in the hands of the older members in whom the pastor has confidence as leaders, is shown by the fact that the ministers do not, today, interest themselves in, and keep as close watch over the work of the society as formerly. It is not uncommon for a meeting to be held by these thirty-five or forty societies without the presence of a minister. This within itself is not so blame-worthy. The minister cannot attend everything. But he used to attend far more frequently than at present.

Another observation from the local union meetings—those societies that are most largely represented at the union meetings, and are most genuinely enthusiastic, are those that are made up of young people of legitimate Christian Endeavor age.

Christian Endeavor came at an opportune time. It came at a time when an idea, long promulgated in certain quarters, but apparently finding no voice in others, was struggling for expression in life—the

The Sunday School--The First King*

H. L. Willett

It was a new experience that came to Israel in the choice of a king to rule over them and to lead them to battle. It was true that the idea of a king was not wholly a novel one in the nation, for the honor had been offered to the great judge Gideon (Jud. 8:22), and had been usurped by his son Abimelech (Jud. 9:1-6). But such an experience was too brief and partial to give the people the impression of a monarchy. Now the work of Samuel had prepared them to appreciate the advantages of a bold and aggressive leadership, and the election of a king was their most important enterprise.

It will be seen that the principle of election was adhered to in the appointment of the new ruler. To be sure our narratives differ as to the method of the transaction, just as they do regarding Samuel's attitude toward the matter. One account makes the anointing private (I. Sam. 10:1); another, the one we have in the present study, makes the event a popular choice directed, however, by the sacred lot; a third (chap. 11) regards the heroic act of Saul in the relief of Jabesh-gilead as the real cause of his election. These three narratives, from different sources, are so placed and linked together by the compilers as to make them fit together as parts of one whole, but their distinct character is easily discerned, as well as the editorial touches by which they are unified (cf. I Sam. 11:14).

The study of today is taken from the Ephraimite source which deals particularly with the prophetic work of Samuel. It will be remembered that this document regards the election of a king as a serious mistake, only to be conceded to an unspiritual and worldly-minded nation. It therefore continues the tone of reproof in its discussion of the theme. In response to the demand for a ruler, and after taking counsel with God, Samuel assembled the nation at the old sanctuary of Mizpah. This was the site about three miles north-west of Jerusalem, now known as Nebi Samwil ("the prophet Samuel") from the tradition that it was his home. Here his grave is shown by the legend-loving natives today. The word "Mizpah" means "watchtower," and there were many places of the name in Canaan. But this was held in special repute from its central and commanding position. In the other narrative the scene of the choice of Saul is Gilgal (11:14, 15).

When the people had been assembled, the prophet first gave them such admonitions as the time demanded. He reviewed the past of their history, poiting out the fact that the great deliverance from Egypt, the most wonreful event in the past, was the work of Jehovah in their behalf. Yet here they were attempting to forsake that leadership which had been their security, and to find in human help the assistance which only God could give. If Samuel could not dissuade them from the new venture, he would at least make them feel the necessity of such obedience to God as should make both them and their new king in some true way the servants of the Highest.

It is clear that the prophet's disapproval of the kingship did not reach the level of a conviction that such a step was wrong. Had such been the case he would not have conceded the privilege of such a choice at any price. It cannot be supposed that a prophet would consent to a course which he felt to be wrong, even at the united popular demand. We are to suppose therefore that Samuel's opposition, as pictured in this source, arose from his feeling that the other plan was better, not that this was wholly evil.

The nation was then summoned to arrange itself by tribes and clans. The choice of a king was not quite a popular election, for the element of chance predominated. The sacred lot was one of the two forms of divination regarded as legitimate among the Hebrews. The other was the oracle of Urim and Thummim. The lot was the casting of stones or bone-cubes like dice, which gave responses by the numbers that appeared successively. These answers were believed to have the value of a divine sanction, and the casting of lots was therefore a last judgment, from which there could be no appeal.

On the tribe of Benjamin the first lot fell. It was the smallest of the tribes (I Sam. 9:21), having been nearly wiped out in the civil war a few years before (Jud. 20). It was a warlike group, whose ensign was the wolf (Gen. 49:57), and its war-cry, "After thee, O Benjamin, among thy people" (Jud. 5:14), had been heard with dismay on many a field of conflict. Then again the dice were thrown and of the clans of Benjamin that of Matri was taken. From this clan it was only another step to select the particular household, and at last the name of Saul, the son of Kish, was shouted out as the choice of the nation for king.

But the young Benjaminite was no office-seeker. At the first calling of his name he had taken alarm and had hastened away to hide among the cattle and camp luggage. When he could not be found, inquiry was made, and a search brought him from his place of hiding. What a youth he was! Head and shoulders above all the people he stood. Such a man would do for a leader in war. When physical prowess as the chief asset of a king, this man gave promise of a great career. In spite of Samuel's supposed disfavor at the proceeding he cannot resist a word of admiration for the tall youth who has been called by the sacred lot to so important a position.

Of course there were some, sons of Beliel, children of folly and destruction, who thought him insufficient. When was there ever a great step taken in advance that some halting and deformed souls did not hold back and complain? The children of folly are not all of one generation. But the nation as a whole rejoiced in the day's work, and shouted for its king. It was indeed the beginning of a new epoch. The nation had passed from the period when "there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes," to the age of order and constitutional government. Saul was not the ideal king, but he was far better than the chaos which he succeeded.

A later note adds that Samuel wrote down the order of the kingdom and laid it up before Jehovah. This is the only record we have of any literary activity on the part of Samuel. There is no hint that the compilers of the canon believed this fragment of Samuel's work to be a part of the present Old Testament. It was one of the many lost sections of the Bible.

NO SACRIFICE OF PRINCIPLES.

From a Sermon by A. L. Chapman.

We desire to indorse and commend the plan and method of union as brought about among our brethern in Canada, where in ten different communities Baptists and Disciples have united and now meet, worship and work together as one people.

It is scarcely necessary to say that neither party would consider any plan of union that would involve the sacrifice of principle or conviction. Division with all its evils and disadvantages is far preferable to that. But we must not mistake our prejudices for convictions. Already there are as great differences between some Baptists and other Baptists as there are between Baptists and Disciples, and there are as great differences between some Disciples and other Disciples as there are between Disciples and Baptists.

Notwithstanding their differences the churches of the Disciples will freely receive Baptists into their fellowship, and Baptists will as freely receive Disciples into the fellowship of their churches. And this is done without any sacrifice of principle or compromise of conviction. First there should be a throwing overboard of prejudices and an effort to arrive at a clear understanding of the positions occupied by each other, and each party should avoid the attitude of the possession of a monopoly of the truth and of infallibility in the understanding of the teaching of the Scriptures. We rest our hopes in this important matter upon the commands and the promises of God. Division is a sin of which the modern church must repent in order to be forgiven and saved from weakness and shame. For this reason we cannot and shall not cease our efforts to bring about union not only between Baptists and Disciples, but also among all the followers of the Lord Jesus.

The Prayer Meeting--Continuing in Fellowship

Topic, July 15. Acts 2:42-47.

Silas Jones

The early disciples were united in the belief that Jesus was their Messiah. The preaching of Peter and of the other apostles had for its theme the Messiahship. Those who were won by this preaching were baptized and brought into fellowship one with another. Faith is the basis of any true and lasting fellowship. Men may yell together at a ball game or a horse race, they may unite in efforts to plunder the innocent and helpless, they maye vote the same ticket and yet be far apart. A profound conviction is that life is worth while and that certain modes of conduct are aids to more abundant life must exist before there can be any real society. Faith in Jesus, in life as he lived it, in the power of God to save the lost, makes possible the church. If churches are lacking in harmony, faith in Christ is lacking. The thing quarrelsome men call faith is desire for preeminence.

A School of Faith.

We are told that these early disciples continued in the teaching of the apostles. The necessity for careful and prolonged study of the facts of the gospels and their meaning in order to a full appreciation of the faith we profess is obvious to any thoughtful mind. The church is therefore a school for instruction in holy living. The church in Jerusalem began in a great revival. The Holy Spirit gave power to the tongues of the preachers, but here was still the necessity for instruction. The principles of the gospel are simple. The facts may be held by the common mind, but the application of the gospel to all the varied interests of men requires the exercise of the highest intelligence that any man can command. There were problems before the church in its infancy. There are great problems before it today. Only men deeply learned in the things of Christ can acquit themselves worthily in the midst of so many perplexities. Ignorance is the mother of confusion. We honor our Lord when we think upon his deeds and words and try to under stand them.

Varied Interests.

Unity of faith is consistent with variety in enjoyments and labors. Men will not work in harmony if they are informed that they must all dress alike and employ the same words in their speech concerning religion. Unity is secured by inclusion rather than by exclusion. Every legitimate human interest should be recognized by the church. The attempt to shut out Christians from participation in politieal affairs results in sectarianism. Another sect is formed on the basis of opposition to secret societies. Another contends earnestly against the love of things beautiful. One man, acting in acordance with the teachings of his sect, tore a flower from the breast of his dead sister in order that he might not seem to countenance worldliness. The pleasures of childhood are regarded with suspicion by some who suppose that they are disciples whom the Lord delights to honor. Not long ago a preacher told me he did not believe in games for young people, and he was thinking of tennis, baseball and work in the gymnasium. The religion of Jesus is not so absurd as these men try to make it. There are forms of amusement inconsistent with its principles. There are metnods enjoyed in the business world which the church must condemn or be untrue to her Lord. The road is narrow. But let us not make it narrower than the Lord made it. We can promote fellowship by encouraging every man in the church to do the work for which he is best fitted and to enjoy the really good things that he likes.

Christian Endeavor--Character and Courtesy

Topic, July 12. I. Peter 3:8-12.

There is nothing superficial in real courtesy. It consists not, as some young people seem to think, in the outward show of court custom, and of display of parlor politeness. Courtesy is of the deeper things and springs from that kind of character which in its essence is unselfish. No one who is at all thoughtful of others laeks wholly genuine courtesy.

That kind of courtesy which finds one way of self-expression in much of thought and even of sacrifice of comfort or convenience for others, is what religion is chiefly eoncerned with. Christ would touch the deepest foundation of men's souls. He would seek the fountain sources and sweeten the springs from which flow every human action. When a man has felt in his life this stirring the waters, when the depths of his heart have been moved by the Master's touch, that fact becomes self-evident in even some of the smallest habits of his every day life.

The courteous man is not needlessly self assertive. Have you ever stood apart to quietly observe men in the midst of the struggling pushing crowd? You know the caliber of the man who in such a situation quickly loses patienee and temper, leaves one side thought of others and becomes insistent in declaring and claiming what he thinks of as his own rights. He hasn't learned his lesson of courtesy. He does not know how to be tranquil, to escape fretfulness and anger, sometimes, by going the length of loss of his own right, even, for the sake of courtesy.

Religion has much to do with this very practical thing of getting along well with men. The well adjusted maehine is freest from wear and break. It is not otherwise in the social organization. The man who seeks to fit into his place, move in his groove and articulate his life with other lives is the man who lives, other things equal, with most of pleasure and success as his meed. Real courtesy makes for this very thing of getting along well with other men.

Courtesy has learned love, the love that suffereth long and is kind. Of what worth is that soul who does not expect too much of his fellow men! We are all just folks, good and bad. The memory of that fact saves mueh of worry in the face of gossip, impatience because of carelessness and discourtesy in the presence of unselfishness. The courteous man endures many things because he knows that men are more good than bad, and deep in his soul he likes the kind of plain, ordinary folks among whom we live and in whose life it is possible for us to find great stores of richness.

PLAYING ALLEGRO.

When the mother returned from a shopping tournament the first thing that met her eyes was a lump on little Willie's forehead.

"For goodness' sake!" she said. "How did he get it?"

"'Tis from the boomp he got," the new nurse explained. "Ye tould me, ma'am, to lit him play on the pianny if he wanted to, an' wanst whin he was slidin' on the top, he slid too far, ma'am."—Judge.

AN EXPENSIVE POSSESSION.

Another case of the universality of labor on the part of every member of the family save the paternal parent is cited in Punch. A small applicant for a country holiday is interviewed by the town visitor.

"What is your father?" asks the visitor.

"'E's me father."

"Yes, but what is he?"

"Oh! 'E's me stepfather."

"Yes, yes, but what does he do? Does he sweep chimneys or drive buses or what?"

"O-o-w," says the small applicant, with dawning light of comprehension. "No, 'e ain't done nothin' since we've 'ad 'im."

"Over almost everything except our virtues there might be written this condemnation: "Too much."

Make me, Pure One, as Thou art,
Pure in soul, and mind and heart;
Never satisfied with less
Than thy perfect holiness.

With The Workers

Prof. J. D. Bowles is helping W. G. Walker in revival services in Farmville, N. C.

A new parsonage is nearing completion in Vernon, Tex. S. H. Holmes is minister there.

V. E. Ridenour, singing evangelist, Topeka, Kas., has an open date for July with a pastor or evangelist.

C. C. S. Rush, of Canton, Mo., has accepted pastorates with the Wythe (Warsaw) and La Crosse, Ill., churches.

Congress has appropriated $1,500 for the American exhibit at the proposed exposition in Tokyo, Japan, in 1910.

C. M. Morton is engaged in a protracted meeting at Macelesfield, N. C. At last reports he was doing well and having large audiences.

John Waugh, state evangelist, is in a meeting in Anderson, S. C., which it is hoped will result in the organization of a new congregation.

The apportionment of the Bible school in Denver, Ill., for foreign missions was $25. The offering amounted to over $100. Prof. B. H. Cleaver is the enterprising pastor of the church.

Roscoe R. Hill, missionary of the Foreign Soicety at Matanzas, Cuba, reports eight recent baptisms at Union, one of the outstations from Matanzas. This makes thirty-one baptisms at this point this year.

C. F. Stevens, Spokane, Wash., is cordially considering a move toward the Living-link in the Foreign Society for that church. The recent visit of Dr. Royal J. Dye greatly stirred the church.

The Fremont Church, Seattle, Wash., has enterd upon days of a larger work and great results. B. H. Lingenfelter, the minister, will begin a meeting in July, in which A. L. Crim will be the preacher, and the Kendalls will sing.

Among the new trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor are P. J. Rice, pastor of the Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn.; Burris A. Jenkins, Kansas City, Mo., and Claude E. E. Hill, Mobile Ala.

During the recent Boxer outbreaks in China, some 2,000 Chinese Christians were killed, but there is no record of a single convert who saved his life at the cost of a denial of his Lord. And yet there are those who say that foreign missions have accomplished nothing.

A contest has just ended between the Bible schools of Timewell, Liberty, Bowen and Denver, Ill. The friendly rivalry continued during fifteen weeks. The contest was won by the Denver school, which was far ahead of the others in the number of points.

A. A. Doak, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the A. C. M. S., has taken up the work of our church in Colfax, Wash., going to that place from Oakesdale, where he accomplished good results. Mr. Doak will have time for some meetings, for which arrangements may be made immediately. Address him at Colfax.

When the fleet of battleships was in the harbor at Seattle, Christian Endeavorers held services on the "Vermont." J. L. Greenwell, pastor of the Queen Anne Church, was the speaker on that occasion. Joseph L. Garvin, pastor of the First Church, and some of his young people, held a similar meeting on board the "Kansas."

Percy M. Kendall and wife, of Columbus, Ind., will assist A. L. Crim, the pastor, in a meeting in the Tabernacle Church, Seattle, Wash., in August. Recently this church house was much enlarged to accommodate a Sunday school with an enrollment of over 450. The re-opening service was held June 7, and was a happy occasion.

The Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Minn., and the Central Baptist Church will unite in services during July and August while the two pastors are away. The cause of union of Baptists and Disciples has moved forward a step in Minnesota by resolutions adopted by both bodies looking toward closer co-operation throughout the entire state.

There is a great disposition among our churches to send their ministers to the National Convention and provide their expenses. This is right. The missionary cause is the business of the whole congregation and not of the preacher alone. Seventy-six Baptist churches paid the expenses of their pastors to the Northern Baptist Convention at Oklahoma City in May last.

In Ft. Worth, Tex., where we have two strong churches within a square of each other, there is good prospect that the property of the Tabernacle Church will be sold and that congregation will erect a new and handsome house in another part of the city. J. J. Morgan and Edward McShane Waites are the pastors in Ft. Worth. There is a good feeling and a close co-operation between the churches.

The trustees and the alumni of South Kentucky College, Hopkinsville, Ky., by unanimous vote changed the name to "McLean College," in honor of A. McLean, President of the F. C. M. S. This step has long been under consideration. The trustees believe it will greatly promote the interest of the college to have a name less local and more universal in its significance. Certainly the name of Archibald McLean stands for the best life and for world-wide things in all our Zion.

IN THE CHICAGO CHURCHES.

Mrs. O. W. Stewart, of the Hyde Park congregation, is spending the summer abroad.

Dr. and Mrs. Betts, formerly with Charles Reign Scoville, are conducting a mission on South Clark street.

The Irving Park congregation will celebrate its anniversary in September with special services.

The Irving Park Church is already arranging for entertainment of delegates to the state convention in September.

W. D. Endres, who recently received the master's degree from the University of Chicago, will begin his labors next Sunday as minister of the Harvey Church.

The Austin Church has in hand the unique enterprise of a "County Fair" to be held July 9-11, for the benefit of the building fund. It is planned to close the affair with an oratorio sung by thirty male voices.

W. J. Rothenburger, pastor of the Irving Park Church, will join with the pastors of three other churches of that suburb in union Sunday evening meetings. The plan proved popular and profitable last year.

Monday evening, May 25, Charles Reign Scoville held services in the Metropolitan Church and received eight additions to the church. In meetings conducted by A. T. Campbell on the following nights of the week there were five more additions.

O. F. Jordan, minister of the Evanston Church, and C. G. Kindred, past of the Englewood Church, were of the number who went from this city to the International Sunday School Convention in Louisville, Ky. They returned last week.

At the regular quarterly meeting of the Chicago Union of the C. W. B. M., which was held in the Metropolitan Church, Mrs. Mary Agnew was re-elected president. Mrs. Agnew has been faithful and efficient in her office, and we can count on continued prosperity of the Union.

Dr. Hugh T. Morrison and Miss Mary Coleman were married in Springfield, Ill., June 23. Both young people have many friends in this city, and a number of them were present at the wedding. Dr. Morrison graduated last month from the medieal department of Drake University and will practice in Springfield. The couple will spend their honeymoon at Campbell Park, Pentwater, Mich.

Disciples of Central Illinois enjoyed a monster picnic at the chautauqua grounds, Havana, June 26. Great companies attended from near-by churches. The time was passed pleasantly in the enjoyment of the usual out-door events of such an occasion and a two-hour program in the auditorium.

NO INSTRUCTION NECESSARY.

Nature, left to herself, often points the way with an uncompromising directness which is more effeetual than any aid of art. The Mariner's Advocate expresses this fact in the following:

"My husband is particularly likely to seasickness, eaptain," remarked a lady passenger. "Could you tell him what to do in case of an attack?"

"'Tain't necessary, mum," replied the captain. "He'll do it."

THE IOWA CONVENTION.

June 18 to 24 marked for the Disciples in Iowa, the date of one of the best conventions in their history. Five hundred and fifty delegates were present and royally entertained by the Capitol Hill Church, which is located almost in the shade of Iowa's capitol and on the same block with the State Historical building.

One of the striking and most encouraging features of the convention was the full program. Every one who had been asked to take part was there ready to do his part. This speaks well for future conventions, and for the general interest in the work.

Thursday and Friday were filled with the C. W. B. M. work. Reports showed great gain along all lines. Every mile post set for the year's work was passed, and far more accomplished than the most hopeful had anticipated. Mason City carried off the honors in point of membership with her 284 members, being the largest auxiliary in the world.

C. C. Smith and Miss Virginia Hartley, of the S. C. I., and Mrs. Ireland, a returned missionary from Porto Rico, thrilled our hearts with their reports of the work they have been doing out on the firing lines. Messages were also read from four of our own Iowa missionaries who are linking our lives more closely with the work on the other side.

Friday evening and Saturday were given to the Sunday school and Christian Endeavor work. At 11 o'clock Saturday a painting of Alexander Campbell was presented to the State by the convention. This will hang in the Historical Building with those of the great men to whom the state does honor. The presentation was made by D. R. Dungan, who voiced the sentiments of the 62,000 Disciples of Christ in Iowa, for whom he was speaking, when he said in his own forceful manner: "We honor the name of Alexander Camupbell, but we do not wear it. One is our Master; even Christ and all we are brethren."

Sunday the visiting pastors spoke in the pulpits of the city, and at 3 o'clock a great communion service was held in the city auditorium, when the hearts of 2,000 Disciples were made tender by the simple memorial service established by Him who said, "As oft as ye do this, do it in remembrance of me."

On Monday we listened to great addresses by G. W. Muckley, W. R. Warren, W. T. Moore, A. McLean and J. H. Mohorter on their respective lines of work. In the afternoon, problems that perplex the churches were discussed by local pastors.

Tuesday was filled with reports of the various departments of the work over the state and discussions of the same. The report shows the following:

Total number of churches in State, 446; churches having full time preaching, 164; churches having half time preaching, 160; churches having fourth time preaching, 27; churches have occasional preaching, 10; churches having no preaching, 85.

B. S. Denney was re-elected State Secretary.

Wednesday was taken up by the Ministerial Association, Burris A. Jenkins, of Kansas City, being the chief speaker.

IRVING E. WADE.

MINNESOTA STATE CONVENTION.

Baxter Waters.

The Disciples of Minnesota met in convention with the brethren at Winona, June 15-18. There were 70 delegates present. The interest was good, the local attendance good. The reports showed a fair increase in growth throughout the state. Last year we reported a net increase of 145; this year 303. Last year there were 216 baptisms and 155 received otherwise, or a total of 371. This year we report 311 baptisms and 222 received otherwise, or a total of 531 (Secretary's report). This work was done without a state evangelist.

The churches leading in growth were Fairmont, Mankato, the Twin City churches and Redwood Falls.

The program of the convention furnished some splendid features. We had Bros. McLean and Muckley and Mrs. Garst, who brought us stirring messages and great blessings.

The opening address was by Bro. B. V. Black, the popular pastor at Mankato, on the work of the young people.

Bible studies on the "Teachings of Jesus" were given each morning by A. D. Harmon, P. J. Rice and Baxter Waters.

Bro. F. J. Dow presented the work of teacher training, and Miss Ada L. Forster spoke effectively on Sunday work, also Mrs. W. D. Ham on the Primary Department.

The most interesting session was the one on Christian union looking to closer affiliations between the Baptists and the Disciples in Minnesota.

Dr. R. M. West of St. Paul and A. D. Harmon each spoke. The session was a live, spirited and there was a deep earnestness. The addresses were marked by candor, charity and deep appreciation of "the things of others." Resolutions were passed to the effect that in the future we avoid duplications, that where it is practicable we have one church instead of two, "that in places where one body has a church and the other has none, each encourage unaffiliated members to unite with the local church with the full understanding that they have a right to hold individual judgment regarding matters of opinion and practice wherein the two bodies may seem to differ."

Mutual acquaintance, union services, interchange of pulpits, etc., were encouraged. This movement has taken considerable hold on our state Already there are many signs of fraternity and good fellowship and evidences of a closer union in some quarters.

Brother C. B. Osgood of Winona was elected by the State Board as the superintendent of missions in the state for the coming year to begin September 1. Brother Osgood is a splendid man, an earnest worker with large sympathies and we are confident if he accepts he will be a useful man in this work.

Julius Stone of Wisconsin, famed for his "unity work" among the Scandinavians, was present and lent his word of cheer. Negotiations were opened between him and our State Board to secure him to open a mission in Minneapolis.

B. G. Brown of Medalia is one of our successful preachers, also C. W. Mortz, located at Rochester, and Brother R. Dobson is our latest importation from England, a splendid man.

The next convention goes to Redwood Falls.

Duluth, Minn.

SAN FRANCISCO'S GREATEST MEETING.

June 21 we closed the Yeuell meeting at the West Side Church. It continued 36 days, and 205 persons responded to the invitation. A few of these may not identify with our congregation—perhaps not with any of the churches. A number came by letter, statement, or reclamation—many of them from other bodies. But the great majority were by confession and baptism. Not a dozen of the 205 were under 16 years of age, even fewer between 16 and 20. Four-fifths of the entire number were full-grown men and women, and the men were in the majority. A number of both sexes were people over 45 years of age, a few ever over 60.

As nearly as we can estimate, our resident membership has been increased 60 per cent, and the real working forces of the church doubled in number. The growth of pastor and people in faith and love, in wisdom and zeal, none can measure. Two things, however, are plain facts Before the meeting it was impossible to make any large part of the church confidently expect even half as great a meeting; now they unanimously declare that we can do all things through Christ, who strengthens us.

Our time was brief for preparation, but events proclaim the wisdom and thoroughness of that which we made. While due regard was had to local conditions, our chief concern was to prepare the field for the special reapers we had called to leadership. Yeuell and I had never met, but each knew the other through correspondence and careful investigation. In him I was in nowise mistaken except that he is a brainier, broader, better preacher, and a more earnest, fearless, consecrated man than I even thought him to be.

Without disparagement of others, let me say that we chose the one evangelist among us that we believed was the man for the time and place. Now we know that we had God's own leading.

I desire to say three things about Herbert Yeuell: As a preacher of the gospel of Christ, to saint and sinner, of whatever kind or character, I do not know his superior. In wonderful degree he combines reason and imagination, culture and simplicity, humor and pathos. His grasp of situation, his knowledge of human nature. his faith in his message, his ability and willingness to adapt himself to the occasion, make him successful any where and practically irresistible in conditions at all congenial.

As a lecturer, he is splendidly equipped through travel, reading and magnificent stereopiticon slides, and his lectures all entertain, instruct and lead to God. "The Making of an American" and "Quo Vadis" were especially fine, but in the minds of all "Ben Hur" stands supreme. This lecture was given to a great audience the night before the meeting closed; and of the 45 who came forward the next day, 35 adults at the last service, many were doubtless largely influenced by the compelling power of that matchelss story of the friend of the Christ, as Yeuell so graphically and beautifully depicts it in speech and illustration.

As a man, his character and conduct are unexceptionable. Never have I seen a rare power and real humility, compelling confidence and sincere modesty, more happily blended. Our personal relations from the beginning were intimate, our conversation frank, our understanding cordial. In public and private, before my people and the general community, he upheld me and my work, the church and its officers, and to the end of life he will credit us with a larger share in the success of the meeting than our most loyal friends would claim.

The West Side Church, our plea in the Bay Cities and on the Pacific Coast, and the cause of Christ in general have received an uplift and a stimulus that eternity must reveal.

Ralph Boileau is a capable leader and soloist, and a worthy assistant of Herbert Yeuell. He sang his own sweet, cheerful, Christian spirit of sacrificial service into every heart. The character of our church music and the lives of our singers especially must always be brighter and better for his work among us.

Mrs. Yeuell was with her husband in San Francisco, and she was with him in body and mind and spirit. Her rare assistance to him directly and her powerful personal work added immeasurably to the forces that combined to give us victory.

We are already planning to have them back again in two years, when we will pray and work for two thousand souls in two months.

Yeuell was a strange and unknown name in this great western metropolis a few weeks ago; to-day and forever it stands in San Francisco for magnetic personality and powerful preaching, for virile Christianity and Christian manliness, for faith unwavering, courage invincible, and certain triumph. A WIDE-AWAKE C. E. SOCIETY.

Sunday, June 21, the Christian Endeavor Society of the First Christian Church, Fort Smith, Ark., had charge of the morning service, and rendered the "Inland Empire Day" program as prepared by Bro. H. A. Denton, Young People's Secretary, Cincinnati.

Mr. G. D. Serrill, chairman of the Missionary committee, presided in the absence of a pastor, Harley I. Croyle, President of the Arkansas Christian Endeavor Union (a member of this church) presented the matter of "Living Link" to the congregation, and in a few minutes more than three hundred dollars was raised for home missions, placing the Fort Smith church on the list of "Living Link" churches.

A. N. Lindsey, Clinton, Mo., has been called by the Fort Smith church, and will take up his duties as pastor September 1. Prof. Kirk, of Drake University, will supply during the summer.

The C. E. Society of this church also holds first place in Arkansas in the matter of the Christian Endeavor Memorial building, having contributed $150 towards that enterprise.

trayals of trust everywhere: if we find a sadly prevalent disposition among us to turn from the highway of honorable industry into shorter cross roads leading to irresponsible and worthless ease; if we find that widespread wastefulness and extravagance have discredited the wholesome frugality which was once the pride of Americanism, we should recall Washington's admonition that harmony, industry and frugality are 'essential pillars of public felicity' and forthwith endeavor to change our course."

WHAT SHALL WE DO?

idea of the unity of all Christians. The conditions of strife and expressions of malice that obtained in the religious world need not here be described. But here and there, and continually multiplying in number, were men and women who felt that the church was greatly handicapped and hindered by these conditions.

As the number of societies multiplied, by their common organization and purpose they were called together. Soon there came into the vocabulary of the religious world a new word: interdenominational. This society was giving expression to the longing in the hearts of many for closer fellowship. It was caught by the idea and carried by it. It caught the idea and carried it. And much of the activity of these early days was wholly dependent upon this one thought. We have not time to follow the development of this spirit, showing itself in various lines of Christian activity in local communities, and probably reaching its climax of convention expression in the Fourteenth International Convention at Boston in 1895, when nearly fifty thousand delegates were present.

But about this time begins to dawn a consciousness which has taken some of the life and enthusiasm from the movement, at least, in America. Many had found in these conventions and in the fellowship of the local work the full answer to Christ's prayer for union. They had gone forth in joy to bring in the sheaves. But now, they begin to learn, and that consciousness has increased each year, that the Christian Endeavor movement was inadequate to the monumental task of uniting the religious world. It had simply furnished a vehicle of expression for the idea ot union but had not furnished a basis for that union.

Now what of the future, if this strong incentive has lost much of its force? Shall we turn completely away from this idea and look for another and attempt to ride it to greater accomplishments? I hardlly think this is possible. While the Christian Endeavor organization has proven very elastic, yet the general lines of work and methods of procedure have become fixed. They could not be changed without destroying the organization itself.

This fellowship between the religious bodies must continue (some one has called it the courtship), until there is an actual, vital union. Hitherto this idea has carried the society, henceforth the society must carry the idea. It was given over, not by the young people themselves, but by the leaders who had been philosophizing about the matter and had found it inadequate. But young people do not philosophize. They are ready to realize, to work together, to be useful in this way, and stop not to ask how fundamental and enduring shall be their work. Let us make more of this line of activity than has been made of it in the last few years, for is not the most fundamental thing, after all, the desire for union, since it must be present before any proposed basis of union will receive consideration?

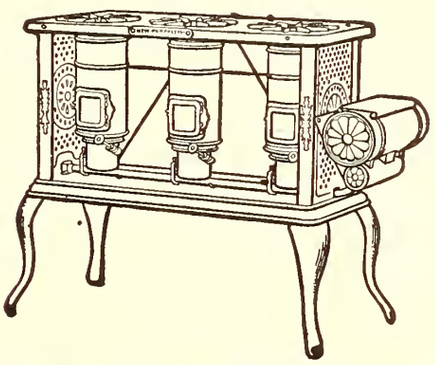
You Will Need an Oil Stove



When warm days and the kitchen fire make cooking a burden—then is the time to try a New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove.

Marvelous how this stove does away with kitchen discomforts — how cool it keeps the room in comparison with conditions when the coal fire was burning. The quick concentrated heat of the Visitors to Bethany at this commencement will enjoy the novelty of a ride from Wellsburg to Bethany over the new trolley line just now being completed. There is every guarantee hat the line will be in operation by the first of June. The fare from Wellsburg to Bethany will be 20 cents. This new trolley line connects us with troley lines at Wellsburg for Wheeling, Steubenville ,and other cities and towns along the Ohio valley. The new arnnegie library has been completed since last commencement and it is pronounced by competent critics to be a model of beauty and convenience. The present senior class of Eethany numbers twenty-five, in all departments, and it is confessedly one of Bethanys most promising classes. The past year has been a successful one at Bethany The work done in the class rooms has been of a hgh order. The college has bade substantial progress in every direction The outlook for the coming session is unusually bright. We have never had such a demand for houses in Bethany as at the present time. More rooms have been engaged by students for next year than at any other time in Bethany's history.

During the session jsut closed. eighty-seven young men and women have been enrolled as students in the Ministerial Department. Of this number, ten are in our present graduating class. The missionary spirit has been pronounced during the year. Bethany boasts the largest Volunteer Bission Band of any of the colleges of the brotherhood. One of our young men, Mr. Chas. P. Hedges, has been appointed missionary to Bolengi, Africa, and will sail in October. Our mission band has conducted several successful foreign missionary rallies in nearby churches during the year.

sage on his memorandum tablet, and tried to bring his mind to bear once more upon the music of the angel choir. For fifteen blissful minutes he worked like a man inspired, and then discovered that the baby was sitting on the hearth, ecstatically rubbing ashes in his curly hair. With the baby under one arm he answered the 'phone again, and promised the superintendent of the High School that he would give a lecture to young men in the Lyceum Course next winter. Holding the baby firmly, he arranged the date and settled the terms; then he rang off, and proceeded to give a special lecture to the young man of his own family.

This done, he decided to leave the section of his sermon about celestial music, and take up the references to those who had passed away since the organization of the parish. This was to be a very touching tribute, and he let the baby take his box of paper clips to play with meantime. He had just begun the eulogy of a former vestryman when Mrs. Barrows entered, exclaiming:

"Oh, Robert, what do you think! Mr. Graves is going to give up the St. Andrew's Brotherhood! He says he can't possibly stand it any longer to work with that old Mr. Hemper; he spoils everything he tries to do, and bothers him all the time—what has the baby got! Why, Rob Barrows, those are brass wires—one of those would kill the baby if he got it in his throat—why, he has a lot of them in his mouth now! Come with mother, poor baby! And, Rob, do hunt up those Sunday school lesson helps for Mrs. Bates—she's going to stop for them on her way home in half an hour. Baby didn't bother you, did he? Bless his little heart!"

(Exit Mrs. Barrows and the baby.)

The rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles sighed. He began to understand why the fathers of the early church chose the monastic life. His eye caught the title of a book on his table, "Aids to Meditation." Then he looked at his sermon. He had lain awake two hours the night before, thinking about that sermon, and it was all so clear in his mind when he came up to the study after breakfast!

He closed his eyes and tried to get back into the mood again, and he had almost succeeded when the dinner-bell rang.

"My dear," said the Rev. Robert Barrows tentatively, as he carved the roast, "I am inclined to think that perhaps I might have the vestry room at the church cleaned out so I can write some of my sermons down there."

"I think you would be very unwise to do that," replied his wife, briskly. "The rectory is much more accessible, and people like to know where they can find you at any time."

"That is true," replied the rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, with a sigh.—The Living Church.

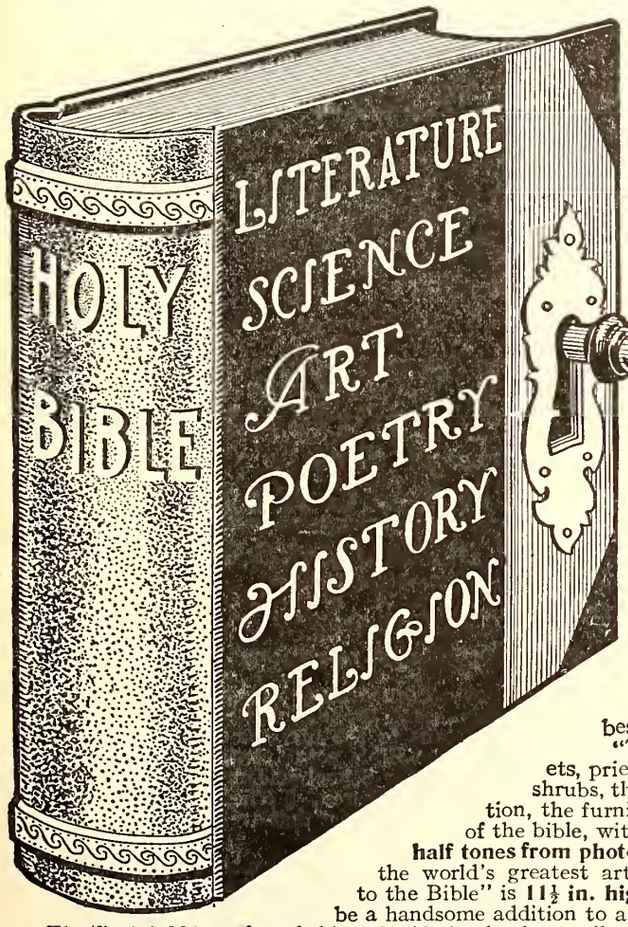
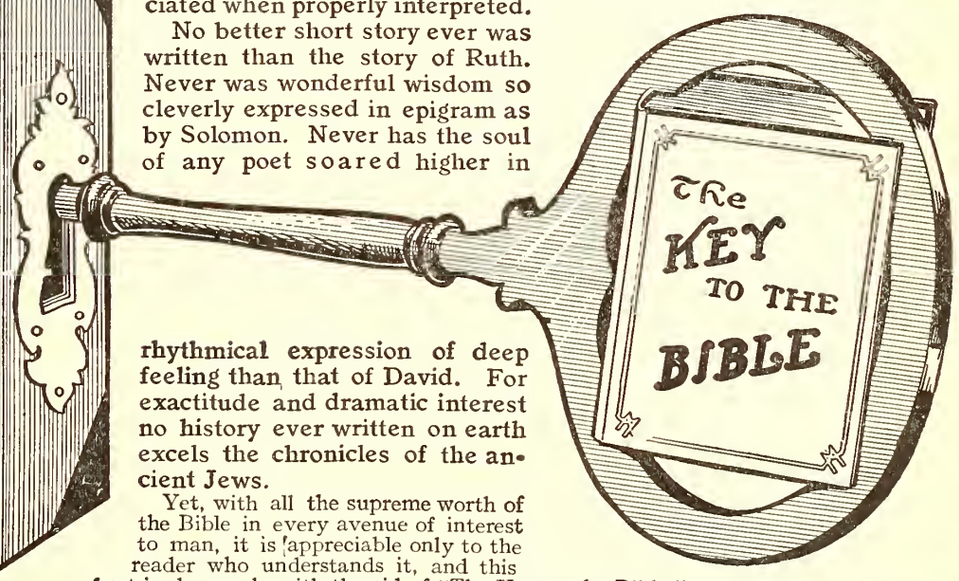
The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.



Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples. houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the Preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

I enclose $3.00 for one copy of "The Key to the Bible" to be sent prepaid.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

A Christian can be a Christian without a Bible, of course. The early Christians had to do without most of the New Testament. But before we claim their example, we may as well be sincere about it with ourselves, and admit that there never was a good Christian who did not want as much of the Bible as he could get. We live in an age when the Bible is the cheapest book in print. We also live in an age when everyone finds time to read the newspapers. The only valid excuse a Christian can give nowadays for not owning and reading a Bible is that he does not know how to read. Other excuses are valueless.

EDITORIAL

THE THRESHOLD OF MEMPHIS.

The work of the British School of Archæology in Egypt during the past season is of very great importance and interest, and holds out to students of the ancient world the hope that Professor Flinders Petrie is on the threshold of discoveries of tremendous value and fascination. Through the earlier weeks of the winter attention was given to a forgotten city, some miles north of Thebes, the ancient Athribis, whose site has hitherto been placed on the maps in the heart of the Delta. Leaving untouched many matters of technical importance, there are three items whose interest will be recognised at once by the readers of this journal.

The most valuable temple unearthed was found to have been begun by one of the Ptolemies about 60 B. C., and to have been completed during the reign of Hadrian in the early years of the second Christian century. Upon the walls of one of its chambers there are carvings of trees and other objects, illustrative of an expedition to the Ethiopian land of Prent in quest of incense. Incidentally it is shown that the shrine of the tribal god of this barbaric land was fashioned in the form of a circular hut, such as have been inhabited by the negro chiefs of equatorial Africa from that day to this. The anthropomorphic conception, the heavenly abode thus illustrated is not without its interest for the student of comparative religions. Close by, a tomb of the same age, informed by Roman feeling, was found to have upon its ceiling two drawings in colour of the zodiac, the only coloured examples of these astrological devices that have been recovered from the ancient past. The significant feature of these preeious remains of religeous art consists in the representation of the souls of the deceased in the constellation of Orion, and the imagination is arrested by the thought that, in the midst of a people who rested their hopes of the future upon the underworld of shadows, there lived men whose thoughts of immortality soared above the stars.

A vivid chapter in the early Christian story of the Upper Nile Valley is unfolded by the work that Mr. Petrie undertook in the vicinity of the White Monastery, which, if I remember rightly, was first described in modern times by Curzon in his "Visits to the Monasteries in the Levant." The British School has traced the course of this remote community from Constantine to Theodosius, and the foundations of the buildings help the student to understand the manner of development of the basilican church in places far removed from Constantinople, where Egyptian and Greek influences were brought to bear upon the conceptions of these earnest architects.

But the triumphs of the season belong to the three months of enthralling labour bestowed upon the sodden ruins of Memphis, which from the far-off days of Menes was the metropolis of Egypt, until the building of Alexandria made it a mere byway of civilization. It was in the streets of this great city that the Hebrew Joseph held his court, upon the huge edifices which arose within and without its walls that Moses used to gaze in boyish wonder. Thebes, for a time, attracted the wealth and learning of the land to the courts of the Pharaohs who resided upon its banks. But there was never a time when Memphis was of no account, and beneath its sunken mounds there repose the priceless treasures of milleniums of ancient life and commerce. Many a long year, much skill and patience, and a stream of gold, will be needed to restore to the world the knowledge that lies within the bounds of these neglected ruins. But when the work is done the value of it will be incalculable, and the glories of Thebes may be found to pale before the greater splendours of one of the oldest and most absorbing centres of the world's civilization.

For the present the work achieved has been preliminary—a prelude to the more serious enterprises that remain to be achieved. Yet there is surely enough here to whet the appetite. The sacred enclosure of the great god Ptah, who gave its name to Egypt, has been marked out, and it is found to have been a third of a mile long, with a breadth of a quarter of a mile. Within this vast spaee lie the foundations of many temples, such as once aroused the admiration of old Herodotus, and the artistic materials found here and there fully support the enthusiastic epithets which he employed. There are altars and decrees, tablets and symbols, covering the nine dynasties wich preceded the days when the Pharaoh of the Oppression turned his architectural zeal upon the sacred enclosure of Ptah. Among these there are some startling objects of the eighteenth dynasty—a century or two before Moses, in the form of models of ears. These are obviously intended to receive the supplications of the faithful, and they imbue with a new vividness the Mosaic metaphor, "ye have wept in the ears of the Lord."

The prolific nature of the material to be unearthed is shown by an incident which occured within the courtyard of the house in which the explorers have set up their quarters. A stone which formed part of the pavement was disturbed, and was found to be the top of a column, thirteen feet high, standing in its original position upon its own base, thus proving the existence beneath the ground of a building which may be untouched. And all over Memphis there have been found innumerable fragments of objects that testify to the industrial activities which were carried on in the outskirts of the city, as they are to-day around the ancient walls of London.

That Memphis had its foreign quarter, its Soho, we have known from the pages of Herodotus. This quarter has been identified, and within it there have been unearthed a series terra cotta figures, such as your modern Italian pedlar brings out of the purlieus of Hatton-garden. The ancient pedler—would that one could fix his date—offered to his patrons a portrait of the Great King, or of one of his Scythian horsemen, a Syrian nomad, a Greek trader, or a Persian archer. But to us his choicest treasures are his models of Indians from the Panjab and the Indus. It gives a new meaning to the commercial activities of the ancient world thus to be brought face to face with men who came out of the remotest East, in the track of the conquering Alexander. Who shall say that, when they went home again to the land of the Lord Buddha, they did not take with them, not only the hoary mysteries of Isis, but, later on, the new precepts of the Nazarene?

IN BRIEF.

Will our preachers and the elders of our respective churches kindly take notice and prepare for a great contribution on Bethany Day, the third Sunday in September (September 20)? If all our preachers will plan for this occason and preach a sermon on the subject, the Centennial offering for the Endowment Fund of Bethany College will be somewhat worthy of our great brotherhood. Let this matter be discussed in the official board of each church in good time for this offering, and let definite action be taken to push the matter so as to make the offering one of which we will not be ashamed. Meantime let individuals send in their special contributions to the St. Louis Union Trust Company, St. Louis, Mo., or the Mercantile Trust Company, Pittsburg, Pa.

Correspondence on the Christian Life

George A. Campbell.

The Correspondent:—

"Perpetual meanings on the troubled sea
Of human thought, and wails from the vexed mind
Of mortal feeling, fill life's wide air."
"Surely all our days are posed away in Thy wrath.
We bring our years to an end with a sigh.
Their "pride is but labor and sorrow."

"The world seems full of sorrow; and sorrow, too, that kills." I have marked a mother's life go out at the death of her son. I have seen the strong man, at the loss of his property, bowed to the earth never to stand erect again. I have seen the lover grieve over the loss of his love till his reason became wild and finally sunk to sullen disorder. I have read of the king "who never smiled again." I have seen friend parted from friend for life by the misunstanding of a moment. While listening to the heartening laughter of a child I have noticed it stricken to the earth never to breathe again. I have seen the good separated from their kind, only to droop and die. "Lover and friend thou hast put far from me." In the morning the youth goes forth for pleasure, upon the lake, and while joking with a companion, he sinks to rise no more. That night there is gloom among his near loved ones. The gloom never lifts. The father says, "My boy has become a man. I shall be proud of him." But the youth forthwith stains his hands in crime; and the father's heart sorely bleeds. In his awful anguish he cries out, "Would that he had never been born." I have passed through the wards of great hopitals till I have felt that all the world is diseased pain. The good are not free. Pain is no respecter of persons. Even the innocent babe is afflicted from its first hour.

Is there meaning in all this pain and sorrow thata has such a universal place in the lives of men? Does God care?

I admit it all. I too have heard the cries of pain and noticed the calloused sorrow that never weeps. This world-burden has entered my own heart. I cannot see a divine meaning in all of it; but I can see God's wisdom in much of it. With Matheson I would sing:

O Joy that seekest me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to thee;
I trace the sunshine through the rain,
And feel the promise not in vain
That morn shall tearless be.

O Cross that litest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glories dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be.

That pain and sorrow are often angels that soften and make us brothers of our kind all of us know. If with our present natures, there was in life no sickness or death, and no uncertainty as to what the scroll of time was going to unroll to-morrow, we would seen become brutishly and unhumanly selfish. Call the roll of those who have interpreted for us the deep realities of life and most will tell us that they came to the deep truths of God through the dark and biter waters of affliction. It was a great preacher who, after a long illness, said: "Rather than to have missed the blessings that came to me through my illness, I would willingly have gone on my hands and knees from the Atlantic to the Pacific." Samuel Rutherford's suffering seems small compensation for Rutherford's message of spiritual insight. The Cross is the price of salvation. Long imprisonment has given us many a great book. The darkness must be known in all its density before we can have a "Lead, kindly Light, Amid the Encircling Gloom." "Paradise Lost" precedes "Paradise Regained." The battle first, then victory. The burial, and afterwards the ascension. Happy, if in suffering we shall have faith enough to endure, and afterwards try to make it a useful experience. There ought not to be any blank days in life.

Easy to Exaggerate.

It is easy to exaggerate the darker things of life. The sun shines as I write; the children romp and play on the street. Surely life is keyed to laughter and song about me. There is fullness of joy. Nature also is glad.

"As I lay a-thynkinge, a-thynkinge, a-thynkinge, Merrie sang the bird as it sat upon the spray."

I am nursing a bruised limb; but it is marvelous how nature is ministering with its healing properties. I shall soon forget about the pain. We remember joy and forget pain. Nature has much balm in Gilead. Health seems to be her goal. Pain is exaggerated. Anesthetics are of recent discovery. But long before we discovered them, nature, after intense pain, lulled the sufferer into unconsciousness and thus stopped his pain. In this we mark a loving provision of the God of nature's laws.

The mental sorrows of life greatly outweigh the bodily pains. But upon these ,too, the universe pours its healing balm. The suicide does not give time a chance. The sorrow which racks and unnerves and seems altogether unendurable is soon assuaged amid the healthful activities of life. Here is a passage from one of Bulwer Lytton's works:

When some one sorrow, that is yet reparable, gets hold of your mind like a monomania—when you think, because Heaven has denied you this or that on which you had set your mind, that all your life must be a blank—oh! then diet yourself well on biography—the biography of good and great men. See how little space one sorrow really makes in life. See scarce a page, perhaps, given to some grief similar to your own; and how triumphantly the life sails on beyond it. You thought the wing was broken! Tut-tut, it was but a brusied feather! See what life leaves behind it when all is done! —a summary of positive facts far out of the region of sorrow and suffering—linking themselves with the being of the world. Yes, biography is the medicine here!

Action, too, is medicine. The action of helpfulness is the best medicine. Sorrow ought to make us increasingly sympathetic. To experience is to understand.

Why Permitted?

As we linger with the cirrespondent's questions of immense sweep, we are carried beyond the pangs of human misery to wonder why a God almighty and all-loving permits pain and sorrow. Man is using all his ingenuity to lessen both. What is God doing? Is he indifferent? None of us are. If we could we would banish every cause of the tiniest tear in the world.

"Do I find love so full in my nature, God's ultimate gift
That I doubt his own love can compete with it?"

Because they cannot see that God is actually concerned to lessen suffering many have given up the doctrine of the love of God, and then, of course, God. Dear reader, be not over harsh with them. The problems of life are great. Rather try and show them to the light.

Browning writes: "A whole I planned, life shows but part." We should not be too hasty in forming conclusions from the past. Again, the aim of life according to Christ is not to have us avoid pain, but to make us good. Character is what the universe is striving for. God's likeness is the object of God. This world is yet in the making. Sin and sorrow are marks of its incompleteness. Sorrow must be here as long as sin is here, and sin will continue while man is being trained by the exercise of his free-will. This world is thus imperfect, but the best world for man as he is. "All's love, but all's law." Through pain and darkness man is being made by helping God to bring the world to a greater perfection. As the flood-gates of the divine life are opened and man lets the life of God come into his soul in unstinted measure, sin will be diminished and sorrow and pain will correspondingly decrease.

God is a partaker in this world's sorrow. The Cross belongs, not on Calvary, but in the eternal heart of God. Pain has a place in the fulness of human joy. Vicarious suffering and transforming sorrow always lead to happiness. Pain and sorrow form the pathway between innocence and character towards which God is ever seeking to lead us. Let us seek to beleive, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with you."

The Cross stands for suffering; but not less for the fullest joy. The greatest joy we know is found in vicarious suffering. My answer falls short of explanation I know full well. Nevertheless is is a hint towards the truth. That which lies between holiness and innocence is pain.

CHRISTIAN UNION

Errett Gates.

The editor of the Baptist "Standard" of Chicago, in a non-committal article, in the issue of June 20, has pointed out certain problems that have been raised by the union that has resulted in the Memorial Church of Christ of Chicago, with Dr. H. L. Willett as minister. After expressing approval of the motives that led the Memorial Baptist Church into the union he says:

"It seems to us however, first of all, that this union has been pushed through with unnecessary and undue haste."

More time ought to have been taken for discussion "in order to secure greater denominational unity." "The denominational relationship of the two churches, also is not well defined, if it is defined at all." "In such a union of two churches, as far from the thought of each as it may be, there is danger that a new denomination may be born which is both Disciple and Baptist, but neither Disciple nor Baptist." The editor goes on to ask what relationship the pastor of the united church will hold to the Baptist denomination. "Does he become by reason of his office a Baptist, while he still remains Dean of the Disciples Divinity House and editor of the Christian Century? Does he remain a Disciple?" He concludes by saying among other things: "There ought not to be others (unions of Baptist and Christian Churches) until the denomination has spoken with enlightening voice. An independent Baptist church may take such action as it sees fit to take, we all admit, but it also ought to remember its interdependent relations with other Baptist churches."

In response to these objections it ought to be said, first of all, that this union is not anything new under the sun; neither is the question of the union of Baptists and Disciples anything new. It may be new to the thought of the editor of the "Standard," but it is not new to the thought of all Baptists, and it is certainly not to any Disciple. The Baptists and Disciples of Maryland have for several years been officially and publicly considering the matter, and have exchanged fraternal delegates in their state conventions. The Baptist Congress at its last meeting in Baltimore discussed the question: "The Next Steps to effect Organic Union between Baptists and Disciples". The actual unification of the Baptists and Disciples has begun in Northwest Canada. The ministerial associations of the two bodies in Chicago began to discuss the "closer relations between Baptists and Disciples" in March, and in their first joint meeting held the first Monday in April a motion was made and carried by the Baptist ministers advising the unification of the Baptist and Christian churches in Rockford, and assuring the Baptist pastor of Rockford that in case of a union, he would be retained in the fellowship of Baptist ministers in Chicago.

But Baptists and Disciples have been discussing reunion since their unhappy separation in 1827—30. It does not look like hasty consideration of the question in view of these facts. The action was hasty, and fortunately so, as concerned the union of the Memorial Baptist and the First Christian churches. A little longer delay would probably have given objectors to the union on both sides an opportunity to make their protests effective. That often happens to two young people contemplating marriage; sometimes to their future joy, sometimes to their sorrow. Now that the union has been consummated, it behooves both sides to make the best of it; before the union both sides were disposed to make the worst of it.

As to the denominational relationship of the pastor and the united church, the Disciples are quite as much concerned about it as the Baptists. The Disciples would like to know, now, whether Dr. Willett is a Disciple or a Baptist. This question does not seem to bother the members of the united church.

They spoke through their minister at the first service after the union, June 21st, and declared that they were going to maintain full fellowship with the Baptist brotherhood, tnd with all Baptist missionary and benevolent interests; and at the same time have fellowship with the brotherhood of the Disciples with all their organized interests. It depends, now, upon the two brotherhoods whether this church shall have fellowship both ways.

The church believes that it has not departed from any item of faith or practice held essential by either Baptists or Disciples. It has meant to be true to every sacred holding of both bodies. The Disciples have no central authority for determinig the matter; and that seems fortunately true of the Baptists also. There seems to be no other way left than for both brotherhoods to take the Memorial Church of Christ at its own estimate of itself and to respect its well-meant purposes.

Just now, of course, Baptists and Disciples at large are asking themselves the question, which body has been the gainer, and which the loser by this union. It ought to be a sufficient reply to this question, to say that the kingdom of God has lost nothing but has gained the inestimable example of two churches, belonging to separate denominations, willing to put away their differences for Christ's sake, and unite for the advancement of his cause. As a matter of fact neither body has lost anything, but both bodies could afford to lose all they have invested in the union for the sake of the experiment in so noble a cause. If it fail, then we have learned something, and will be wiser the next time. But in the mean time the churches have done something, the best they knew under the guidance of the spirit of God, to heal the wounds in the body of Christ, his Church.

Church Houses--The Key to the Great Cities

B. A. Abbott.

With suitable houses of worship distributed properly in the large cities, it would be a comparatively easy matter to evangelize them. If by no other means, we could do so through the Sunday school. It has often happened that a struggling band of Disciples have seen opportunities pass from them while the city grew more and more and they must sit helpless, because they could not equip themselves with a church house. Church extension is helping to remedy this. It gives the people courage to launch out and helps them to help themselves. It makes the weak strong and the strong stronger. A house of worship gives us a place to collect the people and teach them. It is a schoolhouse for the soul. It may be true that the groves were God's first temples, but there are few groves left, and they are not today the best places of worship. We have left the grove for the house, and we shall not return thither, for we are permanently aligned with that throbbing, creative life that runs through the history of God's people from tabernacle to temple, from temple to synagogue, from synagogue to church, cathedral and chapel, and from earthly houses to the City of the New Jerusalem. The church house also commends the cause to the community in which it exists. It is a confession of faith and hope and love and good works. It is a call to brotherhood and the people of the community feel a proprietorship in it and come to speak of it lovingly as "our church" and then they are half won to the cause iteslf. We speak today of "a church home," and the object of a house is to offer such a home to all who dwell near it. It is a call to permanency and to fellowship and all open minded people are ready to respect it and, many of them, to respond to it by entrusting their own souls to the movement. But we find few people today who are willing to attach themselves to a band of religious nomads.

In this connection we are to remember the marvellous expansion of the great cities in late years. It has introduced a real problem into modern religious life. It has produced the suburb and brought about conditions which threaten the spiritual integrity of thousands of the most effective, and virile people amongst us. City life is being re-organized and the people re-aligned. Activities are classifying themselves into home and resident sections. People are building their homes away from their business places. Frontiers are not alone in the West, the Southwest or the Northwest, but also in all the large cities in America. This has created new conditions of life and offers new obligations and opportunities of evangelization; but sectarianism, false philosophy of life and counterfeit faiths have complicated the situation and there is no way to solve it except by houses dedicated to the worship of God. We must follow the people with the ministry of the Word, with the baptistry, the Lord's table, and the shepherd's work of the pastor. The next decade is likely to witness immense activity in church building in the suburbs. The Disciples of Christ must not lose their opportunity. This re-arrangement of home silets and reconstruction of modes of life in our cities afford us such an opportunity for reaching the makers of modern civilization as has not come to us since the middle west was new and being settled by the people who had left the old in order to create the new in home, school, field, shop, bank and church. Going amongst them with the simple Word, our pioneers won hundreds of thousands of them to the way which is doubtless the ultimate religion of the New World, nay, of all the world. We got a hearing, we won and we can continue this East and West if we have the way of approach to people with men and houses. In the suburbs of these large cities and in the new country still being opened, we cannot meet the conditions without houses and we cannot build the houses needed excepting by mutual help. The only effective and sane method of meeting this problem will be with money distributed through Church Extension. Thus this board holds in a peculiar way the key to one of the hardest of modern, social, religious problems. Give the Church Extension Board a fund of a million dollars to handle in the same wise way they have been handling the funds already entrusted to them and you will not only see a revival in which thousands are brought to Christ, but you will see multitudes of people who are today controlling the machinery of society gathered in and you will find that we are not only able to hold them, but that we are able to fill their lives with a new enthusiasm and assimiliate them to these new, yet old, old forms of thought which have been rediscovered and are being applied to modern life by our people. This will give new heart to the evangelist, new courage to the pastor, who is always much quicker to see a splendid opportunity than he gets credit for, and to the outsider who wants to build a character, it will form the strongest appeal to attach himself to us. A new era of city evangelization is upon us and the secret of the strategy that will make us masterful formative forces lies in the Church Extension Board.

Among The New Books

The Master of the Inn. By Robert Herrick. New York. Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908. pp. 84. 50 cents net.

It was a plain brick house, three full stories, with four broad chimneys, and averhanging eaves, in which the events happened. The master was an ex-doctor, who had retired to this remote place among the New England hills, and to him resorted the sick and broken lives of the city to find health and happiness. One of them was the famous head surgeon of St. Jerome's, who found renewal in strange ways at the quiet inn among the hills. Mr. Herrick has told an interesting and wholesome story.

The Last Egyptian. Philadelphia. Edward Stern & Co. 1908. pp. 287. $1.50.

The anonymous author of this story knows his Egypt, and has told a story of adventure and mystery involving the last descendant of an imaginary Egyptian family once influential in the great days long past. The fabulous treasures of a secret cavern under the mountain, the vengeance of a dying woman who had figured in romantic episodes in English society only to be discarded by her English lover, the adventures of the granddaughter of the faithless lover, who is marke for punishment by the youth who inherits the fortune and the feud—these are the materials out of which the story is woven. Incidentally the motive of modern archeological interest is introduced in the person of an English scientist who becomes the means of a happy issue out of all the trouble.

Thoughts for Life's Journey. By George Matheson. New York. A. C. Armstrong & Son. 1908. pp. 286. $1.25.

During many years Dr. Matheson was a frequent contributor to the pages of the Christian World of London. These contributions, which were brief and of a devotional nature, have been gathered, to the number of some fifty, into the present volume. They are especially valuable as aids to private devotion, or as seed thoughts for public service. Each is a comment on some verse of Scripture. "The Hour of God's Call," "The Cleansing of the Temple" and "The Touch of Jesus," the first three topics, will give an idea of the themes selected.

The Doctrine of Modernism and its Refutation. By J. Godrycz. Philadelphia. John Joseph McVey. 1908. pp. 123. 75 cents.

An effort by one of the Roman Catholic clergy of the diocese of Philadelphia to defend the recent papal encyclical against what the defenders of mediaevalism choose to call the doctrine of Modernism. The book discussies the relations of science and faith, church and state, and church and dogma and charges the modern spirit with all the sins of the age. It bears the imprimatur of the archbishop of Philadelphia.

The Story of the Revised New Testament, American Standard Edition. By Matthew Brown Riddle...Philadelphia. The Sunday School Times Company. pp. 89. 75 cents.

Professor Riddle was one of the American committee which co-operated in the preparation of the Revised Version, issued in 1881-1885 in Europe and America. He has told in concise form the story of the plan and preparation of the American Standard Bible. In so doing he has touched lightly but sufficiently on the unhappy controversy which arose over the publication of the so-called "American Revised Bible" by the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge in 1898, using the appendix material of the English edition, published fourteen years earlier. The distinctive features of the American Revised New Testament are pointed out in a closing chapter.

Three Weeks in Holland and Belgium. By John U. Higinbotham, Chicago. The Reilly & Britton Company. 1908. $1.50.

Everybody must go to Europe in this warm and leisurely summer season. Those who can spare the time and money go by ship. Those who cannot must travel by some simpler and less expensive conveyance. Such a book as this not only carries you on a charming journey to the Low Countries, but provides you with all jolly and well-informed company all the way. If you are really going to make the trip, it will be a splendid guide book, with its excellent information about hotels, time schedules and conveyances. The tour includes all the places of interest in the two charming lands named. The illustrations are admirable, well chosen for the purposes of the book.

"THE GRANDEST THING."

What is the grandest thing of all?
The work that awaits each day,
The work that calls us on every hand
Is the work that for us is truly grand,
And the love of work is our pay.

What is the highest life of all?
'Tis living day by day
True to ourselves and true to the right;
Standing for truth from dawn till night;
And the love of truth is our pay.

What is the grandest thing of all?
Is it winning heaven some day?
No, and a thousand times say no;
'Tis making this old world thrill and glow
With the light of love, till each shall know
Something of heaven here below,
And God's "Well done," for our pay.

Lesson VIII.—The Prophetic Histories of the Old Testament.

Herbert L. Willett.

The prophets were preachers of righteousness who made use, among other things, of the past experiences of the patriarchs and the nation in enforcing the will of God. Their narratives of the religious history of the people were gradually reduced to writing and formed two documents, which are among the important sources used by the compilers of the Old Testament books from Genesis to Joshua. The first of these was a narrative written in the Kingdom of Judah, and making use of the name "Jehovah" or "Jahveh" as the name of God. The other was produced in the northern kingdom, and uses the name "Elohim" (God) for deity. The dates of these document may be placed in the ninth and eighth centuries B. C. respectively. They appear, sometimes separated and sometimes combined, in the books of Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy and Joshua.

Following the first six books of the Old Testament, usually called the Hexateuch, in which, as noted, the prophetic and priestly historical documents are combined with the laws of Israel, there come the books of Judges, Samuel and Kings. In these the prophetic interest largely predominates. They are concerned not merely to relate the history of the past, but to employ the facts of the nation's experience in enforcing the principles of the national faith upon the people of their age. They reveal the slow growth of the nation into an organized whole, and the limitations under which the teachers of religion were compelled to labor in the early part of the history. The main teaching of these records is that when the people forgot God and disobeyed His will, they were brought by suffering and humiliation to repentence

The first of these books is Judges. It is much older than the books of the Hexateuch, and is the oldest historical book in the Bible. It is composed almost wholly of materials taken from the prophetic documents of Judean and Ephraimite, or northern, origin. There are a few late additions from the priestly annals. Its first chapters tell the story of the slow and painful occupation of the land of Canaan, and later it records the more important acts of the local heroes called "judges," who acted the part of defenders of the different parts of the land in which they lived, against the invading clans from the neighboring regions. The period covered by the Book of Judges extends from the date of Israel's entrance into Canaan (about 1200 B. C.) to the age of Samuel, Saul and David (about 1050 B. C.). The leading names in the book are Othniel, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson.

The two books of Samuel were originally one, and were likewise a part of the prophetic history which runs through the books of Kings. As in the case of the works already named, the authorship of the books of Samuel is unknown. The name of Samuel was attached to them because he is the most conspicuous figure in the early part of the narrative. But as his death occurs before the close of I Samuel, it is clear that the name is neither that of the author or the chief hero. The sources from which these books were compiled were cycles of Judean prophetic narrative regarding Saul and David respectively, combined with Ephraimite records of the life and work of Samuel. The chief character is David, and the interest centers in the reproof of sin and the rewards of obedience which his life and that of Israel furnish.

The last half of the once-continuous prophetic history is known as First and Second Kings. These books are compiled from prophetic accounts of the lives of David, Solomon, Elijah and Elisha, temple annals, the cycles of narratives collected about such sanctuaries as Bethel and Gilgal, and the state records of Israel and Judah. The account covers the reign of Solomon from the death of David, the division of the kingdom by the activity of the prophets, and the story of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah to the downfall of the one in 721 B. C. and of the other in 586 B. C. Large space is given to the prophetic activity in these kingdoms, especially to that of Elijah and Elisha in Israel.

The little Book of Ruth, though much later in its date, is connected with the Book of Judges by its reference to incidents placed in that setting. Its chief value lies in its lesson of devotion and in the genealogoy which links the Moabitess with David the king. Some scholars place its date in the exile period (after 586 B. C.). Others put it later. It was probably one of the stories which gathered about the ancient city of Bethlehem.

The dates at which these various books took their present form cannot be fixed with certainty. The dates of the books of the Hexateuch will be considered in the sections which deal with The Legal Books and The Priestly Histories. The Book of Judges was probably compiled from documents as old as the seventh or eighth century, by a writer who lived after the reformation of Josiah (621 B. C.), the influence of which may be seen in the book. The books of Samuel-Kings, coming down as they do to the beginning of the Exile, must have been compiled during or after that period.

THE SALUTATION OF THE DAWN.

Listen to the exhortation of the Dawn! Look to this day!
For it is life, the very life of life.
In its brief course lie all the Varieties and realities of your existence;
The bliss of growth,
The glory of action,
The splendor of beauty;
For yesterday is but a dream,
And tomorrow is only a vision,
But today well lived makes
Every yesterday a dream of happiness,
And every tomorrow a vision of hope.
Look well therefore to this day!
Such is the salutation of the dawn.

BETTER POSITION
And Increased Salary as a Result of Eating Right Food.

There is not only comfort in eating food that nourishes brain and body but sometimes it helps a lot in increasing one's salary.

A Kansas school teacher tells an interesting experience. She says:

"About two years ago I was extremely miserable from a nervousness that had been coming on for some time. Any sudden noise was actually painful to me and my nights were made miserable by horrible nightmare.

"I was losing flesh all the time and at last was obliged to give up the school I was teaching and go home.

"Mother put me to bed and sent for the doctor. I was so nervous the cotton sheets gave me a chill and they put me in woolens. The medicine I took did me no apparent good. Finally, a neighbor suggested that Grape-Nuts might be good for me to eat. I had never heard of this food, but the name sounded good so I decided to try it.

"I began to eat Grape-Nuts, and soon found my reserve energy growing so that in a short time I was filling a better position and drawing a larger salary than I had ever done before.

"As I see little children playing around me and enter into their games I wonder if I am the same teacher of whom, two years ago, the children spoke as 'ugly old thing.'

"Grape-Nut food with cream has become a regular part of my diet, and I have not been sick a day in the past two years." "There's a Reason."

The Sunday School--Samuel's Words of Warning *

Herbert L. Willett.

The study of this week follows almost immediately upon the last one. In the Ephramite document of Samuel's prophetic work it comes directly afterward. But in our text, which combines the different sources, there intervenes another account of the manner in which Saul was made king. According to that story, he was ploughing in his field when the messengers arrived at Bibeah, his town with the news that Jabesh-gilead, east of the Jordan, was beseiged by the king of the Ammonites, the people living north of Gilead. In his contemptuous confidence that the city could not be saved from his hand, the Ammonite had granted its people seven days in which to send for help to their brethren on the west of the river.

Relief of Jabesh-Gilead.

When they arrived at Gibeah on their way through the land, there was no offer of help, but only a wail of despair. No one thought of appealing to Saul, for, according to this document, no steps had as yet been taken to make him or anyone else king. When he drove in his cattle at night to the town, where all the farmers of the region lived, he heard the cries of the people over the sad news from their brethren of Jabesh-gilead. Like the Roman Cincinnatus he had no authority to act, but the impulse to help his people came upon him so completely that he took the cattle from the yoke, slew them there, and sent the fragments of their carcasses by messengers throughout the land, with the message, "So shall it be done to the cattle of any man who comes not to war after Samuel and Saul." The response was instant. The relief of Jabesh-gilead was accomplished, and on the strength of the national feeling thus aroused, Saul was made king.

The Main Lesson.

It is not our duty to decide between these various accounts of the election of Saul as to which is the one most in accord with the facts. Probably in various parts of the land the story came to be told in all these ways. But however it was told, it was used to emphasize the relations of the people to God, and the constant insistence, by Samuel and otherwise, upon the danger of forgetfulness of the divine will. In our present study this is once more pointed out to the people by the prophet. He is about to take his leave of them. His sons were not of the quality to follow him, and he was thus thrust out from his place of honor with no hope that any one of his family should follow him in the leadership of Israel. But he has the satisfaction of challenging the nation to name a single time at which he has been in the least selfish in his administration of the position of judge and leader. It was the common vice of officialism in that age as in this, that men rarely administered important trusts of a political nature without yielding more or less to the temptation to profit by their office. It was the constant protest of the great prophets who followed Samuel, such as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Micah, that judges and rulers took bribes and wrested right from the poor because they could not pay. Such words make the messages of the prophets sound like modern sermons, for the sins of that day are the sins of our own.

The Sign.

When Samuel had warned the people against the fatal error of self-confidence and wilful neglect of God's will, he wanted to impress them with the seriousness of his words. It was then the hot, dry time of summer, the days of the wheat harvest. No rain is ever expected at such a time in Palestine. He told them that there would presently be a storm, and that such might be regarded by them as a sign from God of the truthfulness of his words. When the clouds rolled up and the storm broke, the assembled people could not fail to be impressed with this manifestation of the divine anger at their sin and the divine commendation upon the long work of Samuel as judge and prophet.

Then they besought him that he would intercede for them with God that the wrath of heaven might not fall upon them. In him alone could they have hope that God would be merciful. Samuel must stand between them, as an intercessor with God. He was the daysman to lay his hand upon them both. In him the people felt safe. So with words of warning and comfort he closed his interview with them. It all depended upon their conduct. If they forgot God they might expect disaster, but if they were obedient, they had nothing to fear. The great truth emphasized by Samuel in all his leadership of the nation and the king was that obedience is the first law of the government of God. "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams."

PROMOTING THE SUMMER SLUMP.

According to the proverb "it is the unexpected that happens," but as a matter of fact it is the expected that happens. The church expects a reaction after the revival, and it comes. The preacher expects most of the people to stay away from prayer meeting, and they refuse to disappoint him. The members go to church expecting a dull sermon, and they get it. At this season of the year preacher, superintendent, teachers and everybody else unite in expecting a summer slump in the Bible school. In most places it has already put in its appearance on schedule time.

Nine times out of ten the only reason for this annual depression in the Bible school is simply this expectation. Only a few of the members are away for vacation at any one time, and most of these can easily be induced to attend the Bible school where they are visiting. Their number can also be more than balanced by an extra attendance of aged persons and invalids who are shut in at other seasons.

The summer is just the time when the largest number of persons can be brought together for any purpose. It is the time of big conventions, both political and religious. It is the time of picnics; social, religious and commercial. Hundreds of Bible schools have demonstrated that it is the best season in which to build up and even double the attendance.

Plan for improvement, talk of growth, expect to increase, enter into a summer contest with a neighboring school, hold an out-of-door session, utilize the interest aroused by your annual picnic, join the seven schools that have reached the Centennial Aim by making their Bible school enrollment twice the church enrollment. "All the church and as many more in the Bible school" is the Centennial Aim. Make it your watchword for the summer of 1908.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

THE SCHOOLBOY BRAIN.

One of the most substantial and genuine delights for those of humorous appreciation consists in a study of the answers made by schoolgirls and schoolboys in examination papers. A writer in Harper's Weekly has collected a new batch of these, of which the following specimens are among the most choice:

'Blood consists of two sorts of corkscrews—red corkscrews and white corkscrews."

Asked to explain what a buttress is, one boy replied, "A woman who makes butter."

One pupil defined primate as "the wife of a prime minister."

"Gravity was discovered by Isaac Walton. It is chiefly noticeable in the autumn, when the apples are falling from the trees."

To the question, "What is a limited monarchy?" this answer was returned:

"A limited monarchy is government by a king who, in case of bankruptcy, would not be responsible for the entire national debt. You have the same thing in private life in limited liability companies."

Small Margie while at church heard the choir sing "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me." Upon her return home she was heard singing, very seriously, "Rock the babies, kept for me."

A clergyman made an unusually long call at the home of a parishioner recently. He talked and talked, until finally little Edna, who was present, whispered, "Mamma, did the preacher forget to bring his 'amen' with him?"

The Prayer Meeting--Mammon

Topic, July 22. Luke 16:9-13; 12:15, 29-31.

Silas Jones.

By a wise use of wealth a man wins favor with God and men. So true is this that many men have greatly influenced public opinion and gained for themselves a short-lived popularity by professing to use their means wisely when in reality they were serving their pride and love of power. For the wisdom of which we now speak is that of the children of light. To them the shrewdness of the bad man is not wisdom. Wisdom in this sense is not possible without goodness. Abraham Lincoln was a wise man. No political trickster can with propriety be called wise. Now how does the truly wise man deal with wealth? First, he gets it in a way that is not injurious to others. He does not grow rich by impoverishing others. Secondly, he can use wealth and he does use it for the general welfare. His pleasures are those of an intelligent man and not those of the drunkard and the glutton. He upholds clean speech and righteous conduct.

Beware of Covetousness.

The sin of covetousness is deadly. The one who cultivates it destroys his mind and conscience. He cannot enjoy what he has. It may be within his power to know more of mountains, lakes, rivers, the blue sky, birds, trees and flowers than the man whose wealth he desires, but he can never reach the full development of his powers if he is covetious. The poor man, therefore, is in a great need of instruction concerning the dangers of riches as the man of wealth. The poor man may be thoroughly unhappy merely because he is thinking of the advantages possessed by another. He may be pleasantly situated, he may have friends that are rich in knowledge and wisdom, and these he may sacrifice to the evil spirit of covetousness.

An Honest Church.

Yes, a church should be honest in financial transactions. If you would know why some men are out of the church and show a disposition to stay where they are, you may be greatly enlightened by inquiring into the financial history of various churches. When coal bills remain unpaid for months, and the bills for light are ignored, the reputation of the church suffers. A church that is so spiritual that its financial obligations are treated as matters of indifference is not a church for this world. Furthermore, a strict regard for fair dealing would put an end to the restaurant business conducted by many churches. Whenever a church goes into any sort of business, it is apt to be unfair to the men who make their living by that business. It capitalizes its spiritual reputation and thereby gathers together good material dollars. Sometimes it does this to the injury of honest merchants.

The Foolish Anxiety.

There is something more than important wealth. A nation must have wealth. It should not despise the study of the laws of wealth. It should hold in honor its teachers of political economy. There is a great service to be performed by men who study soils and plants and teach the people how to make their farms more productive. But it is possible to have the means of living without the ideals that give to life its worth. The necessity of providing for our bodies may cause all thought about the future to concern itself with food and raiment. "For all these things the nations seek—that is, they absorb the attention of men without ideals. The disciple of Jesus is a man of vision. He looks to the redemption of the race from sin and sorrow. He trusts in God for the triumphs of his cause. How foolish, then, of him to be anxious about food and raiment to the extent of losing sight of his real work in the world!

Christian Endeavor--Total Abstinence

Topic, July 19.

R. L. Handley.

An Ounce of Prevention.

The great results in the promotion of total abstinence are to be obtained in the direction of prevention of drinking habits in the next generation. Some good may be accomplished by reform of those who are already addicted to the use of liquor, but results in this direction are necessarily limited. It is easier and more feasible to keep a boy free from drink until he is a man in judgment with regard to such things, than it is to reform him as a man when he has once become intemperate.

Educate the Children.

Education in the matter of the manufacture and sale of liquor and evil results of the liquor habit will promote total abstinence. The boy who knows beforehand the ingredients used in the manufacture of beer, as commonly sold, will hesitate to pour down his throat such a concoction. Children who have had their eyes opened to real conditions which always accompany the open doors of "the poor man's club" will grow into men and women with little sympathy for the beer and whiskey trusts which prey upon the poor. And those who possess the knowledge that, in every form, alcohol is only and always poison and never a food or even a stimulant, will make some attempt to leave on one side contact with a thing so injurious.

In this direction high value must be placed upon the work that has been done and is being done by the W. C. T. U. Their quiet but unceasing efforts to keep children and young people informed and aware have had, and will have, no small part in the victories of the temperance forces.

The text books of the public schools in some states which include a study of the bodily harm of drinking are of much importance, a fact proven by the efforts of liquor interests to prevent, if possible, such methods of education.

The Breweries and Education.

The brewery interests of the country are now engaged in a campaign of education for their own purposes. Their literature is printed in abundance, their arguments are made to sound as sane and reasonable as possible. It will do much toward the promotion of total abstinence if young people are made to see the mercenary hand of the brewer back of newspaper and magazine articles, and the blood money in the purse of men who take to the platform on behalf of the saloon. It will help if the misrepresentations, misstatement of figures, partial reports of statistics, false quotations of eminent men and physicians are all exposed.

Close the Saloon.

Above all else the promotion of the cause of total abstinence will come as the result of closing saloons. And this is a question largely of method. The essential thing is to have them closed. The agency may be found in local option, as in so many states this year. Other means may avail Be no stickler for any method or party, but keep in view the one thing needful—the end of the saloon. As long as the place to sell drinks is tolerated and the place of manufacture is left undisturbed, laws will be overriden, law officers debauched, and men brought to the drinking place by a thousand means of attraction. The closed saloon would prevent nine-tenths and more of the first drinks which lead on to habit.

Saloons are kept open not by the money of drunkards. They are few. They soon die off. The moderate drinker is accountable for the liquor traffic. As long as any idea of conduct lower than that of total abstinence is tolerated, so long must the people endure the blot of an organized liquor trust, the greatest curse of our industrial and economical life.

"Mamma," exclaimed 4-year old Dorothy one day, "'m so full of happiness that I couldn't be happier unless I was bigger."

Harry's father was bald and one day the little fellow said, "Papa, it wouldn't do for you to fall asleep in the desert, would it?"

"Why not," asked the father.

" Cause an ostrich might sit on your head and hatch it out," explained Harry.

"Great thoughts, great purposes attend the young as fragrant flowers do the honey bee."—Helen E. Moses.

With The Workers

F. H. Cumming has taken the work at Palmyra, Ill., having removed from Pontiac.

The Third Sunday school, Philadelphia, Pa., apportioned $250, sent an offering of $319.69.

T. A. Abbott dedicated the Goshen Christian Church, near Caiusville, Mo., on June 7. It cost $3,000.

Phil A. Parsons has just closed his work with the church at Plainfield, N. J., and goes to Hamilton, Ill.

Claude C. Jones of the Thirty-fourth Street Church, Washington, has taken charge of the work at New Bern, N. C.

J. L. Darsie of Hiram, Ohio has been recalled to the Fifty-sixth Street Church New York City, to fill the pulpit for a season.

J. L. Greenwell of Seattle, Wash., was asked to deliver the Church Extension address at the Oregon and Western Washington conventions.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of June amounted to $42,035, a loss of $17,808 as compared with the corresponding month one year ago.

For the week ending June 17, 595 Sunday schools sent offerings to the Foreign Society, a gain of twenty schools over the corresponding time one year ago.

J. R. Middleton has been recalled to take charge of the church at Lewis, Kan. He served it as pastor for three years until last fall, when he removed to Garfield.

W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of the Irving Park Church, Chicago, recently held a special patriotic service on Sunday evening in which he spoke on "American Citizenship'.'

Miss Alma Favors, of Lu Cheo Fu, China, visited the Foreign Society in Cincinnati, last week. She is hoping to return to China, Sept. 15. She was forced home on account of sickness.

One hundred eighty-eight individuals sent offerings to the Foreign Society during the month of June, a gain of fifty-two over the corresponding month last year. These offerings amount to $1,429, a gain of $454.

Joseph L. Garvin, minister of the First Church, Seattle, Wash., is conducting a series of prayer meeting studies for his people on the "Cities of Paul." The lectures are arousing much interest in the church.

It is very gratifying to know that, aside from the Methodist Sunday schools in America, the Disciples of Christ give the largest amount for Foreign Missions through the Sunday schools of any religious body.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee of the Foreign Society, Miss Nellie Grant of Toledo, Ohio, and Miss Sophie E. Burnette of North Carolina, were appointed missionaries. H. E. Eicher of Hiram, Ohio, was assigned to India.

Encouraging reports from Children's Day continue. The Christian Sunday school, San Francisco, raised $70.24; Pomona, Cal., $375; San Diego, Cal., $300; Pacific Avenue, Spokane, Wash., $30; Elwood City, Pa., $20; Howett Street, Peoria, Ill., $110; Rock Island, Ill., $550.

Perry J. Rice of Minneapolis, Minn., will supply the pulpit of the University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., during July. Mr. Rice was recently honored by receiving the appointment as fraternal delegate from the Minneapolis Ministers' Union, to the Trades and Labor Council of the city.

With the revival of interest in the church at Carthage, Mo., under the ministry of D. W. Moore, has come a determination to replace the present church house with a modern structure. It is planned to build a church costing about $40,000, which would give our congregation the finest building of the kind in that city.

Dr. Royal J. Dye sent the following telegram to the office of the Foreign Society from Seattle, Wash.: "Queen Anne and First Churches become Living-links. Great rejoicing." This means that the new church on Queen Anne hill, Seattle, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society. The First Church supported its own missionary last year.

S. S. Lappin, pastor in Stanford, Ill., has been asked to become the office editor of the Christian Standard. We understand that his acceptance of the duties of the editorial chair is conditioned upon the possibility of his release from his pastorate. In the event of the acceptance of his resignation as minister in Stanford, he will take up his work in Cincinnati, Sept. 1.

W. F. Shaw, pastor of the Sheffield Ave. Church of Chicago, says, in a farewell note to the editor: "I am trying to make Nova Scotia for the second and third Sundays of July, where people of my first pastorate entertain me and invite me to their pulpit for those two Sundays in the absence of any settled minister. This is not prospective, but simply vacational and recreational and for the refreshing of old memories and precious associations. I hope to be back for work again the last Sunday in July."

L. E. SELLERS RESIGNS.

At the close of the morning service, June 28, L. E. Sellers presented his resignation as pastor of the Central Church in Terre Haute, Ind. It is his intention to enter the field as an evangelist, September 1, when his labors as pastor will end. In his evangelistic work he will have the assistance of LeRoy St. John as singer. Mr. Sellers has been pastor in Terre Haute for nine years and during all this time the church has shown the excellent results of his energitic and able leadership. The membership has grown from five hundred to twelve hundred. Other churches have been organized in the the city, and the missionary offerings have so increased that the church is now a living-link supporting Alexander Paul in China. By the ministry of Mr. Sellers the church has been brought to the eve of the enterprise of the erection of a modern and commodious building, which is to be one of the best in the city. The pastor will spend his vacation this month in Emporia, Kan., and Colorado Springs.

GREAT PICNIC AT HAVANA, ILLINOIS.

On June 26, Disciples, their families and friends of Central Illinois to the number of more than two thousand gathered at Chautauqua grounds near Havana for the second annual reunion and picnic. The day was ideal, the grounds of 65 acres at their best, and the committees having the affair in

WIFE WON
Husband Finally Convinced.

Some men are wise enough to try new foods and beverages and then generous enough to give others the benefit of their experience.

A very "conservative" Ills. man, however, let his good wife find out for herself what a blessing Postum is to those who are distressed in many ways, by drinking coffee. The wife writes:

"No slave in chains, it seemed to me, was more helpless than I, a coffee captive. Yet there were innumerable warnings—waking from a troubled sleep with a feeling of suffocation, at times dizzy and out of breath, attacks of palpitation of the heart that frightened me.

"Common sense, reason, and my better judgment told me that coffee drinking was the trouble. At last my nervous system was so disarranged that my physician ordered 'no more coffee.'

"He knew he was right and he knew I knew it, too. I capitulated. Prior to this our family had tried Postum but disliked it, because, as we learned later, it was not made right.

"Determined this time to give Postum a fair trial, I prepared it according to directions on the pkg.—that is, boiled it 15 minutes after boiling commenced, obtaining a dark brown liquid with a rich snappy flavour similar to coffee When cream and sugar were added, it was not only good but delicious.

"Noting its beneficial effects in me the rest of the family adopted it—all except my husband, who would not admit that coffee hurt him. Several weeks elapsed during which I drank Postum two or three times a day, when, to my surprise, my husband said: 'I have decided to drink Postum. Your improvement is so apparent—you have such fine color—that I propose to give credit where credit is due.' And now we are coffee-slaves no longer."

eharge covered themselves with glory. Three railroad trains, one each from Peoria, Springfield and Jaeksonville, pulled into Chautauqua station simultaneously, later trains adding to the erowds, and not an idle moment intervened between arrival and their departure about 5:30.

An unusual array of sports, base ball, basket ball, lawn tennis, croquet, etc., on the athletic field occupied the forenoon, while immediately after dinner, the large steel auditorium was filled to overflowing to listen to the splendid program. J. Fred Jones, the genial secretary of Illinois Christian Missionary Society, was Master of Ceremonies, performing his task in the usual "happy go lucky" style. H. H. Peters, Field Secretary of Eureka College, talked for seven or eight minutes on "Our Centennial Aims," delivered his address in characteristic style by the shortest route, and when he arrived at his destination he stopped. President Hieronymous was moderator of a thirty minute drill down contest between classes of Jacksonville and Springfield. Clarence Depew, the "live wire" of Illinois Bible schools, read the questions from Moninger's Book. This was a very interesting and instructive portion of the afternoon's entertainments. Music was furnished by the Havana Chorus, Ladies' Quartette. Peoria Glee Club, Lewiston, Misses Anderson, Springfield, and others. A brilliant reading was given by Miss Kate Clarkson, gold medalist of Jacksonville. Officers for the ensuing year are: President, E. E. Elliott, Peoria: first vice president, F. M. Rogers, Springfield; second vice president, George H. Harney, Jacksonville; third vice president, L. F. Watson, Petersburg; Secretary, O. C. Bolman, Havana. The date and place of 1909 meeting are left to the officers. The day closed with boating and bathing in Quiver Lake and Illinois River, base ball, tug of war, twenty men on a side, races, etc. Fine Eureka college pennants were distributed as prizes in all events. It was voted a great day for Central Illinois, Eureka college, and all the churches and Bible schools participating, and the second successful event insures another and better one the last of June, 1909.

THE MONTH OF ROSES AND KENTUCKY MISSIONS.

June is not the most favorable month for our work in Kentucky from any point of view. The commencements and Children's Day occupy the thoughts of the young and therefore those who are older are concerned about the same matters. Then it is a busy month on the farms and that hinders both the work of the men and prevents attention to the matter of meeting financial obligations.

William J. Evans, who comes to us from Indiana and most highly commended by E. B. Schofield, has undertaken the work at Lebanon Junction. We hope that he may be able to advance the cause in that difficult field. One added by statement. Indications hopeful.

J. B. Flinchum reports 17 added in Breathitt county and some money raised for church building that is on hand.

D. G. Combs reports seven reclaimed from the world. He has been for most of the month at Hazel Green. So many places are pleading with him to help them that he is restive under regular work.

Three added by J. W. Masters. He gave little time to the field. The sickness and death of his mother forbade that. He is now in Harlan court house seeking to put the finishing touches on the house of worship just built there.

Latonia closed whirlwind campaign and raised about $500.

Five added, three by confession and baptism and two by letter or statement. H. C. Runyon reports work doing well in all departments.

Louis A. Kohler has succeeded J. P. Bornwasser at Bromley and is hopeful.

W. L. Lacy is trying hard to bring up the work in his territory and hopes to be able to make a good report at the annual meeting.

Eight baptisms in Laurel county by H. L. Morgan and two other additions. A mere active campaign will soon be inaugurated by him.

Munfordville has the services of J. K. Reid and he says the work is progressing fairly well.

C. M. Summers suffered the great sorrow of losing the little child just born to them, being only two weeks old at the time of death. He and his wife have the sympathy of their many friends in Jackson, their field of labor.

Bardstown had the services of J. B. Briney for two Sundays in June and matters are about as usual.

Edward B. Richey says the whirlwind campaign for South Louisville debt closes July 12. They will realize about $500 from the effort.

W. J. Cocke held a meeting at Dry Ridge in Grant county. He had eleven additions during the month, four of these by baptism. He is now at Hillsboro, Fleming county, for a meeting. Thomas B. Howe is the preacher there.

Paintsville and the Big Sandy valley are fortunate in having A. Sanders located at the town just named. The secretary was there and the progress being made on house and the work generally is very gratifying. The last improvement is on the house. A Solomon's porch, 10 by 30 feet, is being built in front of the house and a baptistry is put in the porch. You have to go through the baptistry to get into the church, and that is about right. He is also seeking to establish the cause at Louisa, county-seat of Lawrence county. We have there about twenty people—no house.

H. W. Elliott was busy all the month visiting about 12 different places and speaking about twenty times. He was present at several conventions urging the needs of Kentucky missions. Officers were ordained at Quincy, Lewis county, where J. P. Bornwasser has done a splendid work. The receipts for the month amounted to $345.91. This is not enough to meet the obligations of the month. We urge all the friends of the work to bestir themselves that we may go to Hopkinsville with our obligations met. Every church failing to pay the apportionment contributes to a possible defeat, H. W. Elliott, Sec'y.

speak and where the Bible is silent we are silent" as a means of breaking down the discussions of Christendom and building up scriptural churches, we stretch out our hand to you, our brethren in one common cause. In our time of rejoicing and thanksgiving we wish to strengthen the bonds of Christian kinship, not only throughout Australia, but all with our parents in the far off lands of America and Britain. We admit the fatherhood of the American churches, who have from time to time, sent us sturdy preachers of the gospel, while we owe much to the constant nursing of the faithful ones who came to our shores, bringing with them the strong principles of the churches of the motherland. As a result of this combination, we think, we have in a measure inherited the earnest desire of the mother for the restoration of the old things, together with the father's overwhelming wish for the union of the followers of Jesus Christ.

In this spirit of union we now stand, both geographically and ecclesiastically, between our parents and hold out a hand to each. Perchance in grasping the hand of the one and the other, we may make their hands to touch, thus arousing a thrill of kinship which will cause the circle of comradeship to be completed by the joining of hands across the Atlantic. We trust that even now the dictum, the centenary of whose utterance we are about to commemorate may be applied in all its force to both the internal and external affairs of our churches and achieve a consolidation that will astonish the world.

Within a few weeks of this reaching you, the kinship of our races may be most strikingly emphasized by the visit to our shores of the great American fleet and the ensigns of England, America and Australia interwined in political fellowship. This union of hearts is, however, as nothing compared to the spiritual fellowship that should cement the souls of those who have rallied around the gospel banner of love and have pledged themselves in unquestioning obedience to one common Lord.

It is too soon to give a detailed statement as to the centennial celebrations proposed the purpose of this communication being mainly to enlist your sympathy. We welcome to this land of sunshine any members of your churchs who can spare the time and cost of such a visit. We would release them in good time for your own commemorative convention in September, at which convention you may expect to see some of your fellow workers from Australia.

In the meantime please keep this matter well before you and let us hope that the world-wide fellowship in which we may in God's good providence participate during next year will be a fore taste of the eternal fellowship of heaven.

On behalf of the Federal Conference Committe.

SLEEP WELL, MY CHILD.

I hear thy voice, dear Lord;
I hear it by the stormy sea,
When winter nights are black and wild,
And when, affright, I call to thee,
It calms my fears and whispers me,
"Sleep well, my child.

I hear thy voice, dear Lord,
Aye, though the singing winds be stilled,
Though hushed the tumult of the deep,
My fainting heart with anguish chilled—
By the assuring tone is thrilled—
"Fear not, and sleep."

I hear thy voice, dear Lord,
In the singing winds, in falling snow,
The curfew chimes, the midnight bell;
"Sleep well, my child," it murmurs low;
"The guardian angels come and go—
O child, sleep well!"

Speak on, speak on, dear Lord!
And when the last dread night is near,
With doubts and fears, and terrors wild,
Oh, let my soul, expiring hear
Only these words of heavenly cheer,
"Sleep well, my child."

EVANGELISTIC.

Wayland, Mich.—Our Sunday school is in fine condition under A. R. Sooy. The Teacher Training Class numbers 14. Our Children's Day offering was $15. The school sends the pastor to Bethany Park, Ind., July 28-August 6. There have been seven additions recently, one by baptism.

E. G. Campbell, Pastor.

Salt Lake City, Utah.—There was one confession in the regular services June 21, Dr. Albert Buxton, pastor, preaching.

New Mexico.—The work in New Mexico is moving steadily forward. I took the oversight of the work at Albuquerque for three months, resulting in sixteen additions, (five baptisms.) W. E. Bryson has been called to minister. I am now at Deming organizing a church.

F. F. Grim, Cor. Sec.

Brenham, Tex.—A young married man made the confession after my Sunday evening sermon; it was very hot last Sunday, but we had very good audiences. I spent the month of May at Lockhart as headquarters. We have a good church there, which ought to do a strong work at that end of the gulf district. There are several towns of importance and population ranging from three to five thousand, where the Christian church is unknown. New Braunfels is a beautiful little town of about three thousand people, almost exclusively German. The Lutheran and Catholic churches have the field almost entirely to themselves, the Baptists being the only people to represent by a small force, the broader Protestantism. A beautiful park, losing nothing by a comparison with any park in Chicago, borders this pretty little city. The great springs, which pour out their pure and sparkling waters at the foot of an extensive, rocky ridge, feast the eye and slack the thirst of the pleasure seekers. The only stain upon this charming picture is the omni-present beer mug in this part of Texas. Prohibition is not found here, and is not wanted; there seems to be a sneaking notion fostered by some people that, while "prohibition does not prohibit," it is just a little safer to keep it out entirely. I noticed a sign over a public hall "Headquarters of Anti-Prohibition Club." Texas has another variety of "antis," who hold on to their money when the missionary offerings are taken and who don't sing when the organ plays New Braunfels is a fairly good foreign missionary field within our own land and this is not the only place in Southern Texas where the American Christian Missionary Society ought to do foreign missionary work at home.

Fraternally yours,

C. G. Brelos.

Polo, Ill.—I begin my first meeting as general evangelist September 3, at Palestine, Ill. Ransom De Loss Brown is the minister there. My time is all taken to January, '09. Prof. E. O. Beyer of Chicago will be with me part of the time. Churches wanting my services should write me here. I will go anywhere to make the terms satisfactory.

F. A. Sword.

Argenta, Ill.—At the close of the evening sermon, June 28, at Argenta, upon the subject of "A Reason of the Hope Within You." by. L. B. Pickerell, a deeply solemn and impressive service was held and Brother D. H. Carrick, who recently came to us from the Congregational church, was ordained to the ministry of the Word. The remarks on this occasion and the solemn charge delivered to Brother Carrick by Elder Pickerill were fittingly appropriate. The whole congregation showed their appreciation and good will and God bless you by coming forward at the close and extending the hand of Christian greeting and fellowship to Brother Carrick. He will preach for the church at Argenta July 5 and at Kenney, Ill., July 12. It is his earnest desire to be regularly employed as soon as a suitable location can be secured. His present address is Argenta, Ill.

Salt Lake City, Utah.—One baptism and five additions otherwise in the regular services, June 28, Dr. Albert Buxton, pastor preaching.

New Orleans, La.—Have had fifteen additions at regular services during the past four weeks; one of whom was a bright and cultured woman who had never seen a Bible until about a year ago; she received kind treatment from us while she read the Bible and came to her own conclusions as to her duty to Christ and man.

A CALL TO MINISTERS.

Eight years ago, a call, signed by two men, each of whom has since laid down his work here to take up the larger opportunities beyond this present life, was sent out to the ministers of this country and Canada. The call was one which asked for one sermon a year in the early autumn devoted to setting forth the claims of the Bible upon the time and energies of the Christian. The signers of this call were William Rainey Harper, the founder and leader of the American Institute of Sacred Literature, and John Henry Barrows, then president of the Council of Seventy, its advisory board.

It would be difficult to measure the effect of this call. Its plan of interesting people in the study of the Bible, was so simple, its emphasis of the school year as the legitimate Bible-study year so wise, that numerous organizations, in which Bible-study is a feature, adopted it, and at the present time the month of September is almost universally recognized as the time for the organization of Bible-study classes and the promotion of educational work along biblical lines in the church, the school, and the home.

The Institute has a record of five thousand sermons preached on this topic, and this number would probably be multiplied many times if all the facts were known. But does this mean that the plan has accomplished its task and the day need be no longer obseved? This question will hardly be answered in the negative if we consider the attitude which the church, and therefore each member of the church, is called upon to take today, toward the world and its needs.

Since it is clear that the live church and the live Christian must find in the facts and teachings of the Bible so great a source of inspiration, the leaders of the church will welcome, and co-operate with, every attempt to lay emphasis upon and direct attention to the study of the Bible. Bible-study Sunday is the expression of such an attempt.

The educational value of the plan may be clearly seen. It emphasizes the obligation of the pastor to his people as the natural director of their study; it gives the publicity which concerted action affords; it arouses good people who habitually and thoughtlessly read the Bible to a realization of their opportunity; it emphasizes the educational activities of the church with its young people; it reassures those whose confidence in the growth of the influence of the Bible is waning; it makes the Bible at least temporarily a topic of popular conversation; it does all this at a time and in such a manner as to put the study of the Bible on at least an equal plane with all the other activities of the church which have their natural beginning in the autumn. Te observe the day entails no difficult conditions; it gives great opportunity. No one denomination profits by it more than another, statistics showing that all alike are benefited.

Some years ago the ministers who registered their names at the headquarters of the Institute as wishing to observe Bible-study Sunday received, in addition to suggestions for the program of the day, certain sermon outlines upon the theme—"Bible-Study and Its Relation to the Christian Life," prepared by several eminent preachers. The Institute will again this year offer to all who register their wish to co-operate a series of outlines by eminent scholars upon the subject of "The Duty of the American Citizen to Know the Bible." It is not expected that any minister will wish to adopt any one of these outlines in toto, but that the group will give the points of view of the differing mind and attitude of the men who have been selected to prepare them. It is expected that they will stimulate those who read them not to slavishly follow, but to reach out into new field of argument and exposition, each one with his own people in mind and his own local conditions to meet, the great object being always to inspire more and more people to read and study the Bible systematically.

Will you co-operate:

1. By pledging yaurself to observe the day?

2. By distributing copies of pledge cards and of the "Call" to ministers whom you may meet between now and September 10.

3. By aiding the Institute in spreading information in regard to the plan as widely as possible.

4. By keeping the day in your own mind and before your people in such a way that you and they will be prepared when the day comes to embrace with enthusiasm the opportunity to enter upon or to continue systematic Bible-study in one way or another.

Copies "Call," may be secured from the office of the American Institute of Sacred Literature, Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill., in any quantity for distribution.

LASTING INFLUENCE OF EARLY TEACHING.

The author of Proverbs declares, "Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it." Such a clear illustration of this truth has recently come under the observation of the writer, that he feels he must give it to others. Besides its illustrative value, the particular incident will be of historical interest.

One of the greatest and most successful of the early pioneer preachers in southern Indiana and in southern Illinois was Morris R. Trimble. He established many churches through this region; notably among them is the First Church in Vincennes, Ind. He was known for his ability as a speaker and for his marked piety. He was a very godly man. After a long and valiant service for the Master, he was called home nearly fifty years ago.

At his death he left a son who was only nine years old. This son, after his father's death, was placed in the care of near relatives. Early in life he united with the church. After he reached mature years he ceased to be in vital touch with the church. Though living in the city, in which his father had founded the Christian Church, for twenty-five years, he never identified himself with the church. He lived outside of the fellowship of the church during those years. To those who knew him, for many years he seemed to have lost all interest in the church which his father loved so much. Such, however, was not the case. Down deep in his heart there was still a smoldering coal that only needed some special crisis to fan it into a flame. Several months ago he was stricken with that dread malady, cancer. When he learned of his true condition, he faced what was before him with great fortitude. Through all of the intense suffering of his sickness he was patient, never murmuring. On the subject of religion he seemed to be very reticent. On Sunday, May 14, he sent for one of his life-long friends, one of the honored elders of the Vincennes Church. To him he confided the desire of his heart. It was, that he wanted to come back into the church. He desired to again partake of the blessed communion before he departed from this life. On that very Sunday afternoon the writer, in company with a dozen or more godly men and women, held a sweet communion service with our sick brother. When asked before the company of brethren present if it was his desire to renew his covenant with God and to enter into the fellowship of the church of God, he answered in a firm and clear voice that it was. After this the communion service followed. It was a most gracious service. We were all conscious of the nearness of the spirit of God. The service brought great joy and peace of mind to the restored brother. He was happy in the thought that he was at peace with God and in the fellowship of the church that was dear to his sainted father. Two days later, surrounded by loved ones, he passed triumphantly to his eternal rest. He left this world in the way that his father had started him in many years ago, thus fulfilling the saying of the wise man, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it." Their may be lapses, but the law of cause and effect is not easily set aside. It is almost universally uniform in its operation, whether it be in spiritual or physical forces. WM. OESCHGER.

"Sorry not to have heard your lecture last night," said the loquacious lady. "I know I missed a treat; everybody says it was great!"

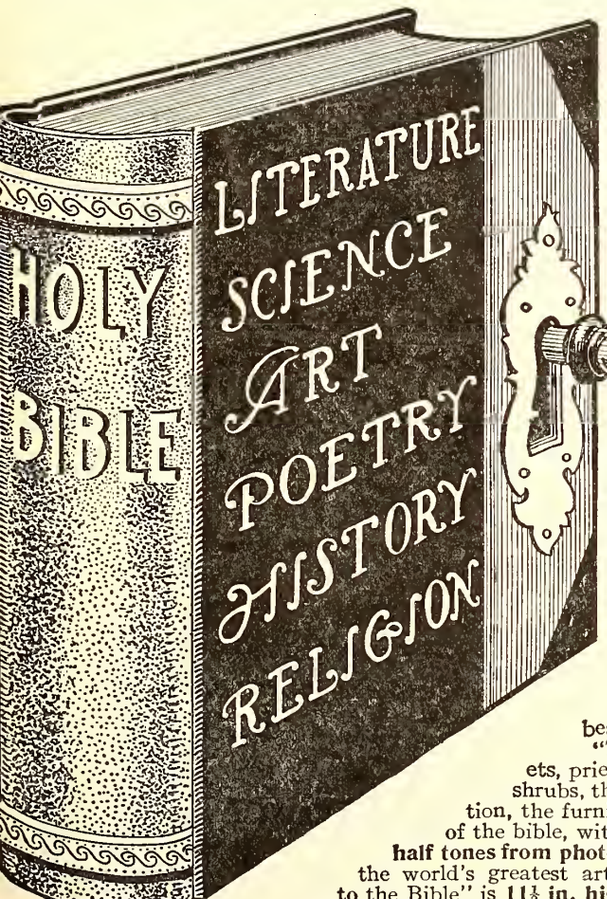
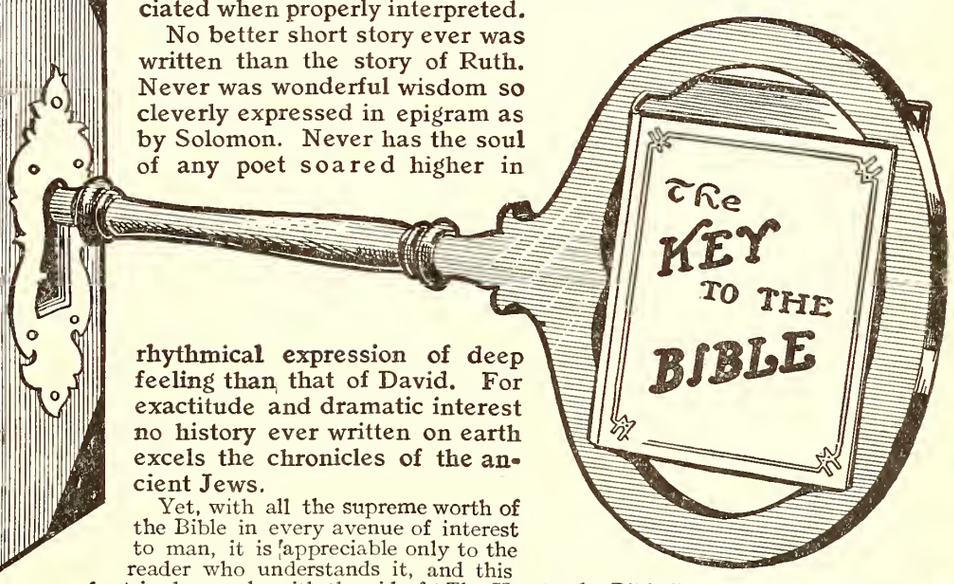
The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.



Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples, houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

WHAT MAKES A MAN GREAT?

By Dr. Samuel V. Cole.

What makes a man great? Is it houses and land?
Is it argosies dropping their wealth at his feet?
Is it multitudes shouting his name in the street?
Is it power of brain? Is it skill of hands?
Is it writing a book? Is it guiding the State?
Nay, nay, none of these can make a man great.

The crystal burns cold with its beautiful fire,
And is what it is; it can never be more;
The acorn, with something wrapped warm at the core,
In quietness says, "To the oak I aspire."
That something in seed and in tree is the same.
What makes a man great is his greatness of aim.

What is greatness of aim? Your purpose to trim
For bringing the world to obey your behest?
Oh, no; it is seeking God's perfect and best,
Making something the same both in you and in him.
Love what he loves, and child of the sod,
Already you share in the greatness of God.

EDITORIAL

THE ORIENT IN LONDON.

It is a notable sign of the times that there is being held this year in the world's metropolis an exposition whose purpose it is to register the progress of civilization through the influence of Christian missions. In the great Agricultural Hall are gathered materials illustrating the manners and customs of the different lands in which missions have been carried on. The homes, occupations, education and worship of the various nations are brought to view in a manner never before attempted. The difficulties under which missionary work labors are thus revealed, and the progress of the peoples under Christian leadership is pointed out.

In further illustration of this theme, a series of pageants has been arranged and is given at intervals throughout the progress of the exposition. One scene is from the far north, one from India, one from Africa and one from the South Sea Islands. In each some dramatic episode of mission discovery by Stanley, and his refusal to return to England, since his black people needed him still. These scenes are accompanied by a grand musical performance which is pronounced worthy of its great theme. The exposition was recently opened with an address by Mr. Winston Churchill, the rising statesman of the liberal party.

This is the first time anything has been attempted on this scale in demonstration of the world-wide significance of Christian missions. It is awakening the interest of travelers and public men, and is calling attention to the fact that missions are no longer an experiment but a world enterprise; that they are among the most important facts of the time, and that they are as worthy of public regard as are the inventions and business interests which are usually the chief features of expositions.

It is to be hoped that before the materials of this pageant are dispersed, they may be brought to America and thus opportunity may be given the people on this side of the Atlantic to understand something more of the greatness of the work which the churches are doing to civilize and uplift the world. It is time that travelers and statesmen were understanding that the greatest fact of modern life is not the commercial outreaches of the west toward the east, but the missionary advances which are revolutionizing the orient, and attempting to give to the east af airer interpretation of Christian lands than our commerce has been able to do.

Faults are thick when love is thin.—Welch.

THE SIZE OF BABYLON.

The Oriental of the German Oriental Society on the extensive explorations carried out on the ruins of ancient Babylon, which has just been issued under the editorship of Dr. Friedrich Delitzsch, is a document of more than usual interest.

Perhaps one of the most astonishing discoveries in the field of topographical re the city, and the ascertainment of the true search has been the tracing of the walls of size of the great city. Wonderful descriptions of the size of Babylon have been given, based chiefly on the hearsay evidence of Herodotus, in ancient times, and the theories of the late Dr. Oppert. These writers made the city a vast parallelogram, surrounded by a wall 15 miles long and 100 feet high, with 100 gates, and bisected by the Euphrates. According to them the area was about as large as London and Paris together, or some 40 square miles. All this wild conjecture has been swept away.

The exploration of the walls commenced at the Babil fort, and here was found a wall 25 feet thick, with buttresses every 60 feet. The line of the wall was traced to the southeast angle, until it bends to the west and joins the great quay on the banks of the river. This portion was pierced by only one gate, the gate of Isar, flanked by tall towers decorated with friezes of lions and dragons in encaustic tile work. On the north it was traced to the river bank. The whole enclosure covered an area of a little over one square mile, or roughly that of the old city of London.

In the Kasr or "palace mound were found the remains of two great palaces, one built by Natupalassar, the other by Nebuchadnezzar. Both were most complex in plan, containing hundreds of rooms for the accommodation of retainers, officials in the royal family. The two palaces are separated by a street. The later or new edifice is on the eastern side, and consists of several groups of chambers arranged around quadrangles separated by strong walls and gateways. The largest of these is a royal quadrangle, entered by a double gateway.

On the south side of this square is the northern facade of the royal audience chamber or Selamik. This facade was 40 feet wide, and had been richly decorated with floral designs in enameled brick in yellow, white, blue and black. The audience south side is a deep alcove with a dais in hall measures 60x170 feet and on the front, where the royal throne was placed.

What a historic chamber this is! Here Nebuchadnezzar had sat and received homage on his conquest of Jerusalem. Perhaps in this very chamber Belshazzar's feast was held and the plaster-covered walls had received the terrible message. Here Cyrus the Conqueror was enthroned in June 538 B. C., and, perhaps, in this very chamber Alexander of Macedon held the fatal revels after his overthrow of the empire of the East.

Nebuchadnezzar speaks of richly decorated palaces and temples, but the one prevailing feature of all the buildings was the dull, monotonous brickwork, void of decoration.

MR. JOWETT'S LONG TEXT.

The weather was unfavorable about church-going time on Sunday morning, but J. H. Jowett, when he entered the pulpit at Whitefield's Tabernacle, found a crowded congregation awaiting him. It was a worthy instrument for him to make music upon—an instrument of ten strings, with not a string missing—and he quickly brought it into tune. His theme was Paul's estimate of Jesus Christ, as it is shown in the Epistle to the Colossians. At the very beginning Mr. Jowett gave his reason for taking this very long text. He said: "If I were to repeat my text this morning I should have to repeat the whole of the Epistle to the Colossians. I think it is well that at times we should get away from inspecting the individual flower, however beautiful, and even away from the wonders of the single hedge-row and the glories of the large garden or field, and, ascending some conspicuous height, contemplate and comprehend some commanding landscape. And I think it is well, even in public worship, that we should occasionally get away from the winsomeness of some particular text, and, climbing some available height, survey a wide expanse of Christian truth, such as is unveiled to us in one of the letters of the Apostle Paul, and I do not think that that exercise was ever more necessary than it is today."

Referring to Paul's conception of Jesus Christ as the fountain of all creative force, Mr. Jowett gave a reminiscence of Henry Drummond. "I just laughed aloud," declared Drummond, as he described his feelings among the Alps early one morning. "I heard him say it," added Mr. Jowett, "and I knew why he laughed. He laughed because he felt that the snow robe was simply the white garment of the King, and that through the vesture he could touch his Lord. He felt the strength of the hills, as the Psalmist says; the strength of the hills is his also. That revolutionized nature. That is the teaching of the Apostle Paul. Is that your Christ? Have you as big a Lord as that?"—British Weekly.

The Spirit of Current Religious Journalism

Will F. Shaw.

From a number of our ministers in different States and in Canada the following quotations are given in response to the inquiry, "What of the spirit of current religious journalism?"

"Perhaps one of the marked tendencies of religious journalism is its subordination of the sectarian spirit. I believe that the great religious journals of the country are in harmony with the broad sweep and liberty of Christian thought. Denominational papers are becoming sweeter in spirit and are unquestionably, I think, doing much to promote fraternity and fellowship among all religious bodies. The general tone of religious journalism is improving, both from a literary standpoint and from the standpoint of openness to whatever truth may be given to them."

"I do not feel qualified to speak in any sense confidently, but there has been, to my mind, such an overleaping of effort to be courteous and kindly, forgiving and generous, that there has scarcely been time taken to assert personal conviction. At least such papers as I take seem editorially to fall under this general condemnation. Not that we ought to be less generous or less charitable, but that this alone will not build up a strong Discipleship. What is true of our own people is true likewise of most other religious papers. We are past the day of dogmatism, but we shall never be past the day of vigorous expression of vital truths. The man would be really conspicuous in this present day of religious journalism who would forcefully re-assert the fundamental grounds of Christian faith and do so continuously."

"The Church Press must be divided into three classes—1st—Those entirely devoted to sectarian interests. These have no interest on earth save the interests of their own communion.

"2nd—Denominational papers which are representative of the principles of the people to whom the editor and publishers belong, but at the same time display a deep interest in Christianity and its progress.

"3rd—Undenominational religious papers which promote Christianity by purveying news and literary criticism. Some of the latter very soon, and most of them finally come to be rather literary than religious in character.

"The Church Press, like the pulpit, should guide the thought and movement of the age; and must be ready to suffer if need be for the one great aim of all religious work, namely—the building up of the Kingdom of Christ and the salvation of men. The spirit of both must be to bear witness to the truth, thus most certainly representing the spirit of Christ: 'To this end was I born, and for this purpose came I into the world, that I might bear witness to the truth.'

"If we can keep the Bible in the pulpit and in the religious press, we will have no trouble about keeping it in the public schools and its principles in law and in politics."

"Religious journalism seems to depend upon the journalist: It might be said in a good many quarters to partake too much of 'critical' spirit and not enough of constructive 'irenicon', of practical Christianity. I believe, however, that the tendency now, amongst our journals is toward a more practically helpful message. Commercialism, of course, has much to do with policy."

"Current religious journalism (denominational) needs to be more in touch with the great common interests of the Kingdom and movements of the Church. The dogmatic, sectarian sheet is an anachronism. I would that we might have one great paper represent every religious interest of our humanity."

"The spirit of our papers has improved in the last six months. Permanently? Don't know. The narrowness is more pronounced than ever. The intellectual vigor is conspicuous by its absence. Compared with religious journalism in general, in almost every respect, we are on a low plane."

"The spirit of current religious journalism is in some quarters as worldly and devilish as secular journalism. There are exceptions, of course. Religious journalism cannot be all it ought so long as it must compete and scramble for existence."

"Current religious journalism represents all shades of thought from pseudo-rationalism to anti-everything. Our religious journals must resist the rationalistic tendency and present Christ and the Bible, not as the flowering of all Jewish genius, but as the revelation of God to man and the law of human duty. The Church of Christ is not as some 'religious' journals imply, a mystical, ethereal, intangible aircastle, nor a registering machine to keep life's records, but the Church of the Living God and home for man. Christianity is the genius, not the evolution of all reform."

"The spirit of religious journalism ought to be the Spirit of Christ; that spirit which seeks first of all to be true to the Master and his cause in the world. 'The wisdom that cometh down from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy.' Such wisdom in our religious journalism will bear the fruits of righteousness, rather than those of strife and vainglory."

"1st: Tell what the Church is doing. (Acts.)

2nd: Hold up ideals.

3rd: Stimulate and encourage.

4th: When necessary—be sure it is necessary—after private correspondence or interview, correct evil, apostasy, sin."

The essential spirit of current religious journalism should be:

1. "Free from unwarranted presumptions and assumptions and conceited dogmatism. 2. Loyal to Christian truth presented, if possible, without denominational bias. 3. Steadfast in the exposition and refutation of errors and false claims set forth in the supposed interest of Christian truth. 4. Devotional, so that the hunger of the heart may be met. 5. Without a feeling of bossism or popery. 6. Frank, kind, clean, outspoken, manly."

"It strikes me that the religious journalism of our time should be free from commercialism. The editor should not keep his eye on the mailing list and take his cue from that. It should be enterprising; it should be aimed to cover the world and to give all the news. It should be decidedly Christian. Moreover, it should stand four-square for what we are pleased to call our position. Once more, it should be courteous. That means a good deal."

"There is a demand for the profoundly devotional. Converts in our great meetings need to be fed. The spiritual culture of the redeemed needs emphasis. There is a disposition to spend too much time and space with things than can be counted and tabulated. 'The things not seen are eternal.' Heaven emphasizes the 'leaven.'"

Be glad when the flowers have faded?
Be glad when the trees are bare?
When the fog lies thick on the field and moors,
And the frost is in the air?
When all around is a desert,
And the clouds obscure the light,
When there are no songs for the darkest days,
No stars for the longest nights?

There are several classes of young men. There are those who do not do all of their duty, there are those who profess to do their duty and there is a third class, far better than the other two, that do their duty and a little more. There are many great pianists, but Paderewski is at the head because he does a little more than the others. There are hundreds of race horses, but it is those who go a few seconds faster than the others that acquire renown. So it is in the sailing of yachts. It is the little more that wins. So it is with young and old men who can do a little more than their duty. No one can cheat a young man out of success in life. Do your duty and a little more, and the future will take care of itself.—Andrew

CHRISTIAN UNION

Errett Gates.

The Disciples and Baptists of Minnesota are discussing the question of closer relations between the two bodies in that State. P. J. Rice has taken a leading part in the movement, as is evidenced by the following report which appeared in the Baptist Standard:

A paper of more than passing import was read before the Twin City conference on June 15 by Rev. Perry J. Rice, pastor of the Portland Avenue Church of Christ, Minneapolis. The subject of the paper was "A Plea for Union Between Baptists and Disciples." Mr. Rice made an eloquent appeal in behalf of the closest possible cooperation between the two denominations looking toward ultimate organic union. The members present expressed themselves as delighted with the spirit of the paper and as in accord concerning the desirability of the object advocated, but after considering some of the practical difficulties involved, they agreed that the consummation, however devoutly to be wished, seemed somewhat remote.

The following "resolutions regarding closer affiliations between Baptists and Disciples of Christ in the State of Minnesota" were first drawn up and adopted by the Christian ministers of Minneapolis and St. Paul, and were later adopted by the Disciples of the State at their convention at Winona:

"Recognizing the growing sense of unity quite generally manifest between Baptists and Disciples of Christ, and believing that this sentiment, so in harmony with the spirit and purpose of our Lord, and so essential to the complete evangelization of the world, should be fostered and encouraged in every possible way, therefore we, representatives of the two bodies named, in the State of Minnesota, do hereby propose the following resolutions as indicating a program of possible co-operation and affiliation:

"First—That in the future we avoid the duplication of churches in towns and villages where there is not a manifest need for two churches, and that in locating churches in the larger cities we each have regard for the territory previously occupied by the other body.

"Second—That in places where both bodies are now represented by organized churches, and where it is evident that one could do the work better than two, we encourage their union upon some basis to be mutually agreed upon by the local congregations, in conference with chosen representatives of each state body and that we pledge our hearty support to all such undertakings.

"Third—That in places where one body has a church and the other has none, each encourage unaffiliated members to unite with the local church, with the full understanding that they have the right to hold individual judgments regarding matters of opinion and practice wherein the two bodies may seem to differ.

"Fourth—That we encourage also every movement looking toward the closer mutual acquaintance of the two bodies; by holding union services wherever and whenever expedient; by frequent exchange of pulpits; by fraternal greetings extended through chosen representatives of each body to the general state gatherings of the other body; by open and platform discussion of the questions involved in the union of the two, and by all other means calculated to promote the cause for which our Lord so earnestly prayed."

These "resolutions" are another evidence that Baptists and Disciples have got beyond the stage of discussion of points of agreement and disagreement; both are beginning to recognize the possibility and the duty of taking the first practical steps in the re-union of the two bodies. We most heartily recommend these resolutions as a wise and careful statement of the action that can be taken at once in most states without endangering any interest of either body in an effort to bring Baptists and Disciples together. There are many ministers in both bodies who feel the call of duty to do something in their own time and place to promote closer relations between them, as a condition of ultimate unification. The question of Christian union has come down out of the cloud-land of pious exhortation and far-away vision in these resolutions. The ministers who framed them believe that something can be done, and ought to be done in their own generation to take away the reproach of a divided church.

The resolution that is likely to raise fears in the minds of the timid is the third. Disciples will at once say, there is a chance for us to lose some members to the Baptists, without any assurance that we will get any in return. But it is a principle which will work both ways. The Baptists might lose members also. Both bodies ought to be satisfied with a scheme that will give each an opportunity to leaven the other. It manifests a lack of confidence in the strength of its peculiar principles and in the loyalty of its members for either body to hesitate to enter into such an arrangement as the mutual exchange of members. That body will permanently lose the most members whose teachings have the weaker hold over the mind. Neither body can afford to make a confession of weakness by showing any hesitation in the acceptance of the third resolution.

This business of fulfilling the pleasure of Christ and responding to the manifest leading of God in seeking to bring together his people, calls for unselfish heroism. There is no place in it for partisan fear or denominational pride. He who comes to the task in the right spirit must forget that he is either a Disciple or a Baptist. The Disciple of Christ who comes to it fearing for the Disciples, wondering what they are going to gain or lose, ldetermined to gain everything and lose nothing for his side, has doomed union to failure in the beginning. There can be no successful prosecution of Christian union without recognition of a Third Party to the transaction —his will and pleasure, and the supreme interests of his kingdom.

If it is just two parties, Baptists and Disciples, who are trying to strike a bargain and lose as little as possible, then true union between them is a long way off.

The supreme inquiry should be, not "How will this union affect the Baptists or the Disciples," but, "How will this union affect the salvation of the world and the coming of the kingdom of God?"

Information concerning all matters touching the problem or the movement for Christian union in all the churches should be sent to 5464 Jefferson Ave., Chicago.

"CHU-CHEO"

Dr. E. I. Osgood.

Chu Cheo is a walled city, north of the Yangtse, forty miles west of Nanking and two hundred and fifty miles west of Shanghai. Within its square mile of wall it has twelve thousand people. The missionary district is as large as Connecticut and has a population equal to that of Indiana. It is covered with low mountains, holding in its valleys the humble homes of a self-reliant, steadfast agricultural people. All traveling and itinerating must be done on the backs of horses and donkeys, on foot, or in sedan chairs.

North, west and south it is one hundred miles to the nearest missionary station. Fifteen miles east is a station of the China Inland Mission where dwell our nearest neighbors, a man and his wife and a single lady. Their principles and practices are in harmony with those of our mission. They have a district as large as the state of Delaware. We do not find time to infringe on each other's territory. One hundred missionaries in twenty-three centers, scattered over a territory as large as the state of New York, with four times the population (25,000,000), that is the situation in Anhwui Province and one-tenth of these people are in the Chu Cheo district.

Why do not the Chinese evangelize the Chinese? Well, they are doing it. In the Chu Cheo district we have the finest set of evangelists in the whole mission. Many of the other members of the church willingly go out and speak for Christ in the fifty market towns in the district as they have time but it would take all the time of the entire present church to cover the district. How are they going to live if they spend their time evangelizing? They are existing under oppressive taxation and high rentals with families to support. On an average they live on seventy-five cents worth of food a month and few of them grow rich. They will already compare favorably with the liberality shown in the American churches and they are going to do a great deal more.

The Christian mission has more influence in Chu Cheo than one-half of the American churches in their respective cities. The country is starting modern schools and they have no one to help them but the missionary. Three years ago we started a day-school for children in Chu Cheo and ten young men came and asked to be taught also. Some of them are of the highest literary rank in the district. They are leaders and do not know how to lead. They have thrown their homes open to the missionaries. We can bring Christ to them through this open door if we will.

CENTENNIAL BIBLE SCHOOLS.

Centennial Aim: All the church and as many more in the Bible school.

Impossible as this goal appears, it had been left far behind by the church at Bolengi, Africa, before the aim was announced. Shortly afterward the Tabernacle Church of North Tonawanda, N. Y., where W. C. Bower ministers reported that it had reached the aim. In this Apostolic church it is taken as a matter of course that one who comes into the church will want to be in the school of the church, and so immediately after baptism he is enrolled in the proper department. At the same time he makes a subscription to the current expenses of the church and receives his bunch of weekly envelopes.

In the course of last year's journeys I discovered that Bellefontaine, Ohio, and Santa Barbara, Cal., were up to the mark, and recently at the New York state convention it developed that the Rowland Street Church, Syracuse, and the Third Church, Brooklyn, have reached it. Alexandria, Ind., passed last winter with 509 in the school, while the church numbers only 251. Then came the Fourth Church, Akron, Ohio, and Cameron, W. Va.

Probably there are many others in the Brotherhood that have not reported. We should like to have information at once regarding all such. We know of a number that are nearly up to the standard in spite of their large church membership. It is much easier for the young churches whose members have not become confirmed in indifference to the church's teaching service.

In its simplest terms the aim is to make the Bible school roll twice as large as the church roll. The home department and cradle roll may be counted. Earnest and persistent effort should be made to enlist every church member, and to send him after someone else. It is astonishing how easily this apparently impossible task can be accomplished when we begin to work definitely for it with intelligence, enthusiasm and perseverance.

A great many of our schools should reach this aim before we come up to Pittsburg next year. Some of those that are near by will attend in a body as living exhibits of the great celebration.

A CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCHES.

At a recent convention in the state of Washington, one topic on the program was, "What we owe to missions." In the discussion, it developed that we as Americans or English speaking people owe all of our knowledge to Christ, and consequently our Christian civilization, to the fact that missionaries forded the seas and brought the gospel to our ancestors. Therefore, we owe it to all the nations of the earth, who are still in the condition in which the early missionaries of the cross found our own ancestors to give or send the same gospel to them, which is the very least we can do in fulfilling this obligation.

Our churches are awakening to their responsibility and our most prominent preachers today are those who are alive to world-wide missions, and whose churches have their own Living-Link. Some of our great churches of 1,200-2,000 members have even two representatives, but it has been left to one of our smallest, youngest congregations to pay the debt they owe to missions, and to let their gift be according to their gratitude and love for the Savior of the world.

One year and a half ago sixty members from the First Church in Seattle, organized a mission church at Queen Anne. They met and are still meeting in a well-ventilated tabernacle, rain and sun pouring through the spaces in the unshingled roof. This congregation has grown to 150 active members, now supporting their own pastor and keeping up all regular expenses, without the assistance of the Home Board. They never forget a single offering. It has been their ambition to make their church a Living-Link. Last week a few of the members awoke to their responsibility and, instead of running away from it, availed themselves of every opportunity for hearing more and influencing others to do the same.

As a result on Lord's Day, June 28, at the close of a missionary address, the pastor, J. L. Greenwell, asked how many were willing to sacrifice something to pay their debt to the heathen. They would like to have a new church, a pipe organ, and all those things now considered essential to converting people at home, but they love Christ more than these and as they loved, they gave, that this love might be known in the dark places of the earth, for which the Christ they loved had died. In just a few moments, without excitement, or emotional pleading, more than enough to support their own Living-Link was pledged. There are no rich members in that congregation, but they give as the Lord prospers them and surely the sunshine of His benediction shone down upon that little consecrated band that day through the chinks in the roof, and it was the warmer because of not being chilled by having to pass through steeples and domes and frescoed ceilings. After the service was closed a little boy came confidentially to the pastor, saying he wanted to give one day's support to the missionary. He was only a poor little orphan lad, earning daily his own living. It was the full measure of his love his "five loaves and two fishes," given as of old to the Master Himself. When that little tabernacle is outgrown and a more comfortable meeting place built, this same self-sacrificing consecration, learned in that little first abode, will go with them to the new.

Is not this a challenge to our whole brotherhood? If this little church of 150 joyously supports their own Living-Link, can a church of 300 be content to do no more? And what of our strong churches of 600 and 1,000? Never again can ever the small churches hide themselves under the poor excuse of inability. Freely ye have received, freely give, and let it be measured only by your love and gratitude to your Lord and Master, who has committed unto you His trust as He in parting said, "Go ye into all the world."

THE TRANSFORMATION OF AN ANARCHIST.

The minister of a wealthy church was telling about his men's club. The club holds frequent meetings devoted to the discussion of public questions, and when the speaker of the evening has concluded, opportunity is given for volunteer discussion.

"One evening that I remember well," said the minister, "the first speaker, when remarks from the floor were called for, was a young fellow whom I had never seen before—apparently a German. From the first sentence I saw he was bent on making a rabid anarchist speech.

"He knew that there were a good many wealthy men in my church, and he seemed to think he was bearding them in their den. He delivered one of the most violent assaults on wealth that I ever heard. He denounced the government, too, and in fact, the whole social order.

"It was my habit to sum up the discussion before the meeting adjourned, and speaking that night, I referred to the remarks of the stranger, complimented him on his earnestness and honesty, and in a very mild fashion indicated some points on which I could not agree with him.

"After adjournment, several of our men went and shook hands with the young man, told him they were glad to have him present and invited him to come back again.

"He did come back, and didn't make any more such speeches. He joined the men's club and became one of its greatest enthusiasts. He served on every committee of the club, I think.

"Better than that, he began coming regularly to church. We soon made him an usher, and he took marvelous delight in welcoming strangers. He had a fine hearty way of making friends.

"It was a long time after when he said to me one day:

"'That night I made that fool speech at the men's club, I expected you men to jump square on me and throw me out into the street. But when you all treated me so decent, I went home feeling meaner than a dog.'

"He's been gone from the city a year or two now, but he comes back frequently on business, and whenever he's in town, our young German friend shows up again and is as happy as a boy getting back home."

The representative of a great manufacturing industry remarked:

"We had an odd experience down at the factory with a foreigner who was a rank anarchist. He was always preaching against wealth and property, and declaring that the workingman ought to make a revolution, and so on. He was certainly again

The Sunday School Lesson

Obedience Better than Sacrifice*

Herbert L. Willett.

The campaign of Saul against the Amalekites is one of the hard places in the story of Samuel's life. It seems so little dictated by the laws of humanity, and so cruel in its conduct, that it is at first difficult to account for such an incident in the career of the prophet. Of course the Amalekites had as much right to the land as the Hebrews, and more, considering the fact that they had long been settled there. But there was an ancient grudge between the two peoples, and Samuel, as the champion of Israel and their God, Jehovah, was deeply hostile to the neighboring tribes, whose presence was a menace to the nation, and who worshiped other gods.

The Amalekites

It was not strange, therefore, that he should command the king to make a campaign to the south against these Amalekites and exterminate them. Samuel was a prophet of Jehovah, and the greatest man of his age. Yet these facts did not save him from the narrowness and cruelty of the time. He hated all the nations who interfered with Israel's prosperity. It was not difficult to believe that such people were sinners beyond the mercy of God, and worthy of slaughter. We are never asked to apologize for the evil deeds of even so good a man as Samuel. We have in the lesson his view of the king's duty, and his rebuke for the failure to perform it.

The Raid

Saul was not slow to obey the command of the prophet. Like the good soldier that he was, he probably enjoyed the excitement of the campaign, and the satisfaction of the national feeling of vengeance upon a hostile people. He marched to the far south, the region in which they lived, and then bidding the friendly tribe of the Kenites depart from the vicinity that they might not be caught in the raid, he fell upon the Amalekites and swept their land with destruction. So far as the ruin of the tribe was concerned, the command of the prophet was completely fulfilled.

Keeping the Spoil

The sin of Saul, in the eyes of Samuel, consisted in the fact that he saved from the spoil of the raided district some of the flocks, and brought back the Amalekite king to grace his triumphal entry into his home city. In other words, he attempted to make profit out of a campaign that had in the prophet's mind the significance of a divine chastisement. This was the perversion of its entire purpose. The question of right or wrong in order to exterminate an entire clan of people did not arise in his mind. His own deep hatred of the foe and his equally fierce devotion to the cause of Israel and Jehovah he felt to be the tokens of God's will. That he was mistaken in his interpretation of the character of God is not surprising. The prophets were the best men of their age, but they were not perfect men. Had they been such, there would have been no need that a Greater Prophet should arise in the years to come.

The King's Excuse

When Saul and Samuel met on the king's return from the campaign, the prophet was surprised to see the people driving home the herds and flocks which they had taken from their enemies. When questioned on this point, Saul insisted that they were intended for sacrifice, apparently forgetful that a sacrifice could have no value as a mere act of ritual, and apart from the sense of devotion which prompted it. How could the nation offer an acceptable sacrifice of that which they had taken from others? Yet such acts of devotion are not wholly unknown at the present time.

Samuel's Condemnation

The king soon discovered that his excuse was not adequate. It was plain that the herds had been taken not for sacrifice but to keep as spoil. To Samuel this was rank disobedience to his command. There were enough other opportunities to raid and plunder the neighboring tribes. The campaign was wholly a religious act, a retribution upon a hated foe. Therefore the king could offer no apology that was sufficient in the eyes of the prophet. He condemned Saul and warned him that God was soon to take the kingdom from him and bestow it upon another.

Samuel's Harshness

In our study of this scene it is easy to conclude that Samuel's judgment was harsh and that the king had done nothing to merit such severity of condemnation. But it must be remembered that we are reading from the document which gives Samuel's side of the story, and insists that the choice of a king was wrong from the first. More than this, we have only a few items given out of the whole series of deeds that made up the total of Saul's actions. The judgment of the prophet was not based on two or three deeds of indifference or disobedience, but upon the whole character and disposition of the man. He was fundamentally unable to understand the views and purposes of the prophet. Saul belonged to the dealthy farmer class and despised the entire group of prophets as useless, fantastic and unworthy of leadership. To him the man of the sword and bow was worth a regiment of preachers. He did not comprehend the value of men whom the greatest of kings of later days were to hail as the chariots of Israel and its horsemen. So Saul and Samuel never understood each other, and since Saul was too impulsive and headstrong to be guided by wiser judgment, his downfall was clear as soon as his disposition became apparent.

Saul's Rejection

On the other hand it must be admitted that Samuel was harsh and peremptory in his conduct toward Saul, just as he was in his attitude toward the Amalekites whom he sent the king to destroy. Something must no doubt be permitted to the man who for a generation had virtually ruled the nation. He was in no mood to try foolish experiments, or prolong arguments with one who could not see the plan of the nation's life as he saw it. So his condemnation was swift and severe. He would listen to no entreaties from Saul, and was hardly willing to appear with him in public again.

The Value of Obedience

Whatever may be thought of the conduct of Samuel in his treatment of Saul, there can be no question that his words to the king in this lesson are among the greatest utterances in the volume of Old Testament prophecy. It must not be understood that mere unreasoning obedience is ever demanded of any man. God's message to men is, "Come, now, let us reason together. There is no divine command for which there is not a motive in the nature of man or the demands of the kingdom of God. But when this has been understood there is no release from the obligation of God's commandments. This is what Samuel made clear to Saul in that memorable interview. The king had cloaked his desire for the spoil with the pretext that it was intended for sacrifice. Even so, the prophet wants him to understand that obedience is of greater value than any sacrifice can be. God does not want the fat of animals burned upon altars half as much as he wants men to hearken to the voice of his prophets. This is Samuel's great lesson to Israel. It is a truth

The body is a precious possession given us by God, a blessed helpmate for the spirit. Every single power which the body enjoys is holy and divine; but it is holy and divine only in its proper place, as servant and not as master. It is not that we honor the body too much. We honor it far too little. Giving way without stint to its greedy desires is not honoring it. Then only do we begin to honor it, indeed, when we learn to thank God for the manifold blessings which we enjoy by its means, and pray daily that He will keep it and all that is within us under the guidance of His Holy Spirit, which is the spirit of power, and of love and of a sound mind.—F. The Prayer Meeting--Life's Race

Topic, July 29. 1 Cor. 9:24-27.

Silas Jones.

In the Greek race the victory of one contestant was the defeat of all the others. Only one man could win the prize. In the race of which Paul writes the success of one man does not mean the failure of any other. On the contrary, exery prize winner in the race of life helps others to win. The failure of one runner hinders the others. The swifter the runners on our course, the greater will be our speed. Herein is one of the great joys of the moral and spiritual life. If we succeed, we have the assurance that we have not brought to another the sorrow of defeat. In the hour of weariness and faintness, we are aroused by the consciousness that if we give up the race we make doubtful the success of many others.

Expect to Win.

Victory comes only to those who expect it. The man who starts out to win may fail; the man who makes no attempt or puts forth feeble and uncertain efforts is a failure at the beginning. Of course there is a boastful self-assurance that prophesies defeat. The self-assurance that grows up in the untried life and will not take counsel from experience is not to be classed with the confidence that wins victories. The winning man believes that he was made to success. He believes that God does not mock his children by putting into their hearts desire for victory which can never be realized. Many partial failures do not quench this desire, nor should they put an end to hope. The defeats that come should have the effect of purifying the desires and of giving a wortheir conception of the purpose of life. There must be something of the heroic in him who will not yield to repeated failures. He must feel that he has not yet put forth his full strength and that when he does he will surely win. And the full measure of his strength includes that which the grace of God supplies to every earnest soul.

The Discipline of the Race.

The Greek runner was carefully trained for his great trial. He exercised self-control in all things. He aimed to have his body in its highest efficiency. His city demanded this of him and he demanded it of himself. An untrained man in the race would have excited ridicule. There was not the remotest chance for him to win. It seems to be taken for granted by many people that training for life is wholly unnecessary. Men who spend large sums of money for the training of their horses object to paying a fair salary to the teacher of their children. They spend much time every day at the stable in order to see that no horse is neglected, but they do not know what is happening at the school house. We ask that a carefully prepared man be called to minister to our bodies when we are sick, but we too often undertake to answer serious moral questions without having prepared our minds to deal with those questions. Because we are compelled to face perplexing situations we seem to feel that in some mysterious way wisdom will come at the right moment. Experience does not justify this trust in ignorance. The prepared man has a judgment that cannot be matched by an unprepared man who relies on sudden illumination. Theories of conduct do not suffice. The habit of doing right is our only safety. We need to discipline ourselves in the practice of goodness until it becomes hard to do wrong. No one of us is without good habits of some sort. We need to enlarge the number of these, and at the same time to keep our minds open for the entrance of new ideas of conduct adapted to new conditions and enlarging conceptions of life.

MESSAGE ON THE TOPIC.

By H. A. Denton, in C. E. World.

Home missions is a relative term; to the French its scope means France; to the Germans, Germany; to the Italians, Italy; to the English, England; to the Scots, Scotland; to the Irish, Ireland; to the Americans, America.

Every homeland should be known by its home people. We seek for wonders in other countries without knowing those of our own. The church of each country owes a debt to its own people. That debt is not discharged until they are evangelized.

To speak of the home mission schoolhouse is to emphasize the need of teaching the people, first, the Word of God, and second, the condition of their native land. There remains yet very much land to be possessed in every nation. The homeland is to be evangelized under the same commission as every land, "Go ye into all the world."

Not alone for its own sake, but for the world's sake must every land be made a scene of greater home missionary activity.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Nowhere is the problem of good and efficient schools, of practical education in industry and character, more serious than among the 8,840,789 negroes in the United States. Here is a great multitude at our very door. We do not need to make long journeys by land or sea to reach them. If we do not lift them up, they will hold us back, even if they do not drag us down. There are good schools to train teachers for them. These need our support, and the teachers which they train should be placed in the many scattered places where such teachers are needed. That also means duty on our part toward our home mission agencies. Are we truly doing all that we ought?—R. E. Speer.

A Recitation.

Let the following poem, by President Caroline Hazard, of Wellesley College, be committed to memory and recited in the meeting:

Great Western Land, whose mighty breast
Between two oceans finds its rest,
Begirt by storms on either side,
And washed by strong Pacific tide,
The knowledge of thy wondrous birth
Gave balance to the rounded earth;
In sea of darkness thou didst stand;
Now, first in light, my Western Land.

In thee, the olive and the vine
Unite with hemlock and with pine.
In purest white the Southern rose
Repeats the spotless Northern snows.
Around thy zone a belt of maize
Rejoices in the sun's hot rays;
And all that Nature could command
She heaped on thee, my Western Land.

Great Western Land, whose touch makes free,
Advance to perfect liberty
Till right shall make thy sov'reign might,
And every wrong be crushed from sight.
Behold thy day, thy time, is here;
Thy people great, with naught to fear.
God hold thee in His strong right hand,
My well-beloved Western Land.

Being a Christian is not a matter merely of being good, but also of doing good; not a matter merely of saving self, but also of saving others.—Hedden.

To a great many people the principal meaning of sanctification is self-satisfaction.—Harry G. Hedden.

"It has been said that no man has yet discovered all the good there is to be found in his fellow man. It often seems as though we are many times most blind to the good in those whom we really hold the dearest. There is an unseen good in every one, though they may be unattractive to us."

Evangelist Clarence Mitchell was married recently to Miss Bertha Sprague, daughter of Chester Sprague, pastor of our church in East Liberty, O.

An able sermon preached by William Oeschger, Vincennes, Ind., on Anti-Cigaret Day, was published in full in the daily papers. The sermon subject was "Burning Brains."

The churches in Fulton County, Ohio, expect to combine their offerings and be able to become a Living-Link in the Foreign Society. They hope to support W. B. Alexander in India.

The North Side Church, Kansas City, Kas., will build a new church house in the near future. It will cost about $30,000, and will be a modern and handsome structure. J. S. Myers is the pastor.

Simpson Ely, one of our oldest evangelists in Missouri, was killed by a fall from a street car recently. He was at one time president of our college in Canton, Mo., and built up a large church in Kirksville, Mo.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first seven days of July amounted to $11,873, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $3,989. There was also a gain of thirty-one contributing churches and 181 Sunday schools.

A telegram from Dr. Royal J. Dye, Eugene, Ore., to the Foreign Society, announces some thirty volunteers to the foreign work and $15,000 raised for a mission steamer for the Upper Congo. This is cheering news to all the friends of the work.

Mrs. E. T. Ford of Detroit, Mich., one of the prominent members of the Church of Christ in that city, died on Sunday, June 28. Mrs. Ford was a generous given to the missionary and educational interests of the Disciples and she will be greatly missed.

Earl Wilfley of Crawfordsville, Ind., was a visitor in Chicago last week on his way to Kansas City, Mo. He has resigned as pastor in Crawfordsville to accept a call to the First Church, St. Louis, Mo. The labors of his new field will be taken up October 1.

The executive committee of the Chicago Christian Business Men's Association meets every week to further the plans for the coming of the Illinois state convention the first week in September. Chicago Disciples are determined to make every possible preparation for a great convention.

We are glad to have the word that S. T. Willis of New York City is recovering nicely from an operation on his throat June 11. He will not attempt to preach regularly before fall. Meanwhile his pulpit will be supplied by the assistant pastor, D. H. Bradbury, and J. L. Darsie.

W. B. Alexander, of the East Side Church, Toledo, Ohio, will go out to India in September, as the missionary of the Foreign Society, instead of to China, as was announced. The imperative need in India at this time, on account of the death of E. M. Gordon, seems to make this step necessary.

W. T. Clarkson was drowned June 18 at Rome, Ga. Mr. Clarkson was a graduate of Transylvania (Kentucky) University, a student in Union Theological Seminary and pastor in Rome, Ga. He was but twenty-nine years old and gave great promise for his labor as a minister. The Rome church had doubled in membership three months after he became pastor.

L. C. Howe, pastor in New Castle, Ind., has part with other ministers in the city in a series of Sunday evening union meetings. He preached in the Presbyterian Church July 5, to a crowded house. Mr. Howe has been kept busy with an unusual number of weddings and special addresses to the number of fifteen. In every department his church is prospering.

Dr. and Mrs. C. P. Hard, former Methodist missionaries in India, are delivering a series of seven lectures on "World Wide Mission" in the church in West Pullman, Ill. Guy I. Hoover, the pastor, has the church in excellent condition and is bringing our work to the front in that community. He recently made addresses, by invitation, at the public school graduation exercises, at the citzens' celebration July 4, the memorial service of the Odd Fellows' and Rebekahs' lodge and on the occasion of the anniversary of the same lodges.

R. D. McCoy, one of our missionaries in Tokyo, Japan, writes us under date of June 16:—"The third annual commencement of our Bible College in Takinogawa, Tokyo, was held on June 11. Four young men received diplomas, and are going out to work in the vineyard of the Lord. Two will locate in or near Tokyo, and one each in the Sendai and Akita districts. They are well prepared and we expect to hear good reports of their work. The prospect for students next year is good; already several have signified their intention of entering."

The annual meeting of the First Church at Duluth, Minn., was held June 30. The reports showed that all departments of the church are in good working condition and substantial growth has been made in the past year. About $1700 has been expended on improvements, most of which has been provided for. The Sunday school has been the best in the history of the church. The fine new county court house is under con-

MADE RIGHT.
It Won the Banker.

"At the age of seventeen I was thrown on my own resources," writes the cashier of a Western Bank, "and being low in finances I lived at a cheap boarding house where they served black coffee three times a day.

"At first my very nature rebelled but I soon became accustomed to it and after a while thought I could not get along without it.

"I worked hard during each school term (I was attending college) and taught country school between times.

"At the end of three years I had finished my course—my nerves too, and I went back to the farm to rest up. This did me some good but I kept on drinking coffee not realizing that it caused my trouble, and later accepted a position in a bank.

"About this time I was married and my acquaintances called me 'Slim.' On the advice of a friend my wife began to serve Postum and she made it right from the start (boiled it 15 minutes after boiling actually starts). I liked it and have used it exclusively for three years. I am no longer dubbed slim, my weight has increased 60 pounds and I have nerves to stand any strain without a flinch. And I have increased my salary and my shares of bank stock. I can work 15 hours a day, sleep soundly and get up feeling like a healthy boy." "There's a Reason."

struction just two blocks below the church. W. S. Austin and C. E. Holt were elected elders, and Thomas Tidball was re-elected superintendent of the Bible school. Baxter Waters is the capable pastor.

L. E. Sellers has resigned his pastorate at Terre Haute, Ind., where he has rendered admirable service as pastor for several years past, and has secured the assistance of LeRoy M. St. John, with whom he will soon begin an evangelistic campaign. Mr. Sellers is a preacher of power and persuasiveness. He has been very successful, both in pastoral and evangelistic work. Mr. St. John has co-operated with such eminent evangelists as Northcut, Harlow, Pinkerton, Crossfield and Small. Sellers and St. John recently held a very successful meeting at Owensboro, Ky. Their work among the churches will unquestionably be of a high order and such as will permanently build up the churches for which they labor.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

Considering the fact that the place of holding the convention was changed from Watertown to North Tonawanda as late as May, the way in which the three churches of Tonawanda rose to the occasion was commendable. Because of its central location on the interurban trolley line, Tabernacle Church was used for the regular sessions, though Central and First churches, Tonawanda, each shared in equal responsibilities of entertainment. The ladies of each church took turns in serving meals.

The attendance at the various sessions was very good and the interest sustained throughout. Two papers read before the convention were worthy of a wider reading: Arthur Broden, the talented minister of the Auburn Church, on "Every Minister His On Evangelist," and A. B. Chamberlain of Throopville, our venerable bishop of the Empire state, on "The History of the Disciples in New York." The former, while giving due credit to the work of the evangelists, pointed out the need of retaining the evangelistic spirit in the regular services, and depreciating the tendency to cover up personal defects by large ingatherings on the wholesale plan. Bro. Chamberlain's address should be printed and preserved among the monographs on the rise and development of our people.

The reports from the various mission points in the state showed marked gains, especially Elmira and Rowland Street, Syracuse. Every mission reported progress and the immediate future bright with possibilities. A spirit of optimism regarding work in the Empire state prevails and other new fields of promise will soon be entered.

The wider interests of our brotherhood were presented by Bros. McLean, Mohorter and Warren, thrilling us by the recital of accomplishments in other fields.

The sessions of the C. W. B. M., Bible School, Endeavor Societies, and Men's League, were well atended and interesting. Mrs. Harrison delivered the centennial address at the women's session, while Mr. Paul D. Hanks honored the men's meeting with an excellent address on "The Face of a Man."

There were two incidents in line with the various movements of union, one a proposition from the trustees of Kenki College, Kenki Park, N. Y., to assume joint ownership with the Free Baptists of that institution, and another, an address of Dr. Case Porter of the Delaware Baptist Church, Buffalo, on the "Union of Baptists and Disciples." For breadth of view, charity, and hopefulness about the outcome of the movement, this address took most of us far beyond the place we had expected the speaker to direct us. He wisely pointed out that sanity, charity and care must needs be exercised less undue haste may precipitate a crisis which will work more harm than good to the movement toward union.

The officers chosen for the ensuing year are: President, Dr. Eli H. Long, Buffalo; First Vice President, A. B. Kellogg, Buffalo; Second Vice President, Dr. Duncan Sinclair, North Tonawanda; Recording Secretary, B. S. Ferrell, Buffalo; Corresponding Secretary, D. C. Tremaine, Williamsville; Treasurer, D. Kruebel, Williamsville; Superintendent of Bible Schools, Joseph A. Serena, Syracuse; Superintendent Y. P. S. C. E., W. C. Bower, North Tonawanda.

The next convention comes to Syracuse, June 1909. Jos. A. Serena.

ITEMS FOR SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA AND ARIZONA.

J. P. Conder, of Oregon, has taken hold of the situation at Tucson with a firm grasp. He reports good audiences and the people greatly encouraged. Having established two other churches in great cities on the coast, he writes that this opportunity is the best he has ever met in his work in the West.

W. T. Adams, our pastor at Corona, saw the fruit of his labors in the dedication of the new building at that place. C. C. Chapman was present June 21st and raised $1,100, which enabled the house to be dedicated free from debt.

Levi McCash, the efficient man at Ontario, recently greatly enlarged our plant there and called upon F. M. Dowling to dedicate the building June 21.

Charles Reign Scoville and his company of evangelists are at this writing beginning a meeting with our Pasadena Church. This is said to be the finest building of our Brotherhood in the West. Its cost is represented by $80,000. This building will be dedicated at the close of the series of meetings now begun.

John Cronenberger has accepted a call to the church at Santa Ana, and is already busy in the new field. His pulpit recently resigned at Santa Barbara will be supplied during the summer by C. A. Young.

An effort is being made to enlist a number of churches in an evangelistic campaign this coming season under the leadership of Geo. L. Snively. Beginning in Colorado in the fall, and coming through Arizona, he will be ready for meetings in Southern California about the last of November. Write to the secretary for terms and dates.

Mrs. Princess Long, from the United States, recently paid a hurried visit to her Southern California home. Arrangements are about perfected for her return to the coast for permanent residence. We anticipate her presence for our Long Beach Convention.

John T. Stivers, Evangelist, who labored most successfully this past year in Southern California, has secured a home in Los Angeles at 2,728 Kenwood St. This betokens his presence and his work among our churches for a time. He will find plenty to do.

DeForest Austin, until recently of Nebraska, the editor of their State paper, has located in Southern California. His home is at Inglewood, Los Angeles.

W. H. Hanna, of the Philippines, where for six years he has labored under our Foreign Board, arrived in Los Angeles last week. He is home on a furlough. Our churches will not let him rest long; we are hungry for the message he will bring us of the victories of the Cross following the Flag.

DIFFERENT NOW

Athlete Finds Better Training Food.

It was formerly the belief that to become strong, athletes must eat plenty of meat.

This is all out of date now, and many trainers feed athletes on the well-known food, Grape-Nuts, made of wheat and barley, and cut the meat down to a small portion, once a day.

"Three years ago," writes a Michigan man, "having become interested in athletics, I found I would have to stop eating pastry, and some other kinds of food.

"I got some Grape-Nuts and was soon eating the food at every meal, for I found that when I went on the track, I felt more lively and active.

"Later, I began also to drink Postum in place of coffee and the way I gained muscle and strength on this diet was certainly great. On the day of a field meet in June I weighed 124 lbs. On the opening of the football season in September, I weighed 140. I attributed my fine condition and good work to the discontinuation of improper food and coffee, and the using of Grape-Nuts and Postum, my principal diet during training season being Grape-Nuts.

"Before I used Grape-Nuts I never felt right in the morning—always kind of 'out of sorts with my stomach. But now when I rise I feel good, and after a breakfast largely of Grape-Nuts with cream, and a cup of Postum, I feel like a new man." "There's a Reason."

DR. DYE'S CAMPAIGN.

Dr. Dye's visit among our churches is awakening an interest in the world's evangelization without a parallel in the history of four people. He is a voice of a John the Baptist. Men and churches and, indeed, whole communities are being aroused that were never before touched with the thrilling story of the gospel's beneficent power over pagan lives. The mighty deeds being done at Bolengi, Africa, is the history of the Acts of Apostles repeated again.

The conquests of Uganda and of Burmah and of the Fijis are paralleled in the marvelous history being made by our missionaries on the Upper Congo.

Dr. and Mrs. Dye are now on the Pacific Coast. They are visiting churches and conventions in Idaho, Washington, Oregon and California. Wherever they go the reports are the same. New converts are being made to the mission cause, indifferent churches and preachers are being born to a new and larger life, and the most interested are made to feel a fresh and larger interest. New Living-Link churches are being made, a large number of volunteers have been enlisted, and a spirit of liberality quickened that has never before been witnessed in all that region. For example, we have just received, at the office of the Foreign Society, a telegram from Eugene, Ore., announcing gifts aggregating $15,000 for a mission steamer on the Upper Congo. This is a vital need. We had not dared to hope for such gifts for this purpose at this time. But our poor faith has been rebuked by the vision and liberality of our brethern in Oregon. We are thrilled with joy over the news.

The simple and artless story of Dr. Dye wins all hearts. Free from cant, free from even a suggestion of egotism, free from pietism, the straightforward recital of the simple facts of what has been done in the field to which he has consecrated his life, sounds like the victories of the gospel in the first century. His great speeches remind one of the early labors of Robt. Moffat in Africa.

Wherever Dr. Dye goes they want him to return, and the calls for his visits are far beyond his time and strength to meet.

When he reurns to Bolengi, he will carry with him the prayers and best wisnes and material support of thousands of new friends.

All other passenger associations have been awaiting the official announcement of the Southeastern Association, and now they will take up the matter and we have hope that they will also give us a satisfactory rate.

Several of the largest railroad systems in the Southwestern Passenger Association have given notice to the Southwestern Excursion Bureau that they are going to give a rate of one fare for the round trip plus fifty cents for validating purposes. The round trip rate from Houston, Texas will be $11.35; from San Antonio $17.35; from Dallas, Texas, $15.80.

The Trans-Continental Passenger Association has granted a rate of $67.50 for the round trip from the Pacific Coast States; good to return, leaving New Orleans as late as the 30th of October; tickets to be on sale the 4th and 5th of October.

If we can judge by the special favors which we have been receiving from God in working up this convention, surely, we shall have a glorious climax to our efforts in the New Orleans Convention.

POMONA COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

Wednesday, June 24th, was commencement Day at Pomona College—OUR COLLEGE.

This is the school which most generously opened wide its gates to the Fellowship of the Disciples some two years since. This experiment is proving a most happy experience to both parties, as acquaintance with the men, life and atmosphere of this splendid Christian College develops, the Disciples are gradually awakening to the fact that they have a vital connection with the best college on the Coast, a real voice and vote in the management of an educational equipment represented by a plant worth $250,000 and an endowment of $350,000, a faculty of forty professors and instructors, and an attendance of 300 students in collegiate courses.

At the commencement exercises we were happy to note the attendance of as many preachers from among the Disciples as those of the Congregational body. This year the graduating class numbered forty-eight young men and women; twenty-two of them received the degree of Bachelor of Science, eight the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and eighteen the degree of Bachelor of Letters. The sight of these young people receiving, at the hands of President George A. Gates, their sheepskins—tokens of their worth—was most impressive and elicited the expression of great admiration from the large audience present.

The high quality of work done by the institution was evidenced in the thoughtful addresses delivered by the graduates.

That this college is fulfilling its mission to develop Christian character, and living up to the high ideal expressed in its motto "Our Tribute to Christian Civilization" is evidenced by the subjects chosen, as well as the spirit in which they were considered by the graduates. They are worthy of mention here; "Citizenship and the Christian College;" "The Debt of the Church to Early Latin Hymns;" "Our Political Duty to our State;" "The Trend of Evolution;" "Modern Architecture."

On the Board of Directors the Disciples have five members, C. C. Chapman, F. M. Dowling, John Fleming, W. L. Porterfield and A. C. Smither.

The greatest educational need among all Christian Churches of Southern California is to realize this day their opportunity We need to know Pomona College for our own good. A knowledge of the educational opportunities and advantages here afforded will be followed by an interest that will wed "Our People" completely to this educational enterprise. It is another case of "Information, Inspiration, Realization."

INLAND EMPIRE NOTES.

Good reports continue to come in from Inland Empire Day. Many of the societies report that it was a great day in the history of their missionary forces.

From reports sent in, we find that just at the time of the meeting a storm broke on a great many of the societies in Missouri, Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska. The indications are, that there was a general rain storm over those states on the night of the 2 8th. Some societies reported a decreased offering on account of it, some reported a deferred offering, and in some instances, no offering at all. Let all societies, that were in anyway put out by bad weather, plan to overcome the difficulties, by appointing a committee to raise an additional sum, or by observing the day at some other time, say the last Sunday in July, which is a place for another Home Missionary topic.

A good many societies pledged to observe the day, and ordered supplies, but they have for some reason or other, delayed to report results. The department is anxious to have reports from all societies, so gather up the fragments, report the offering, and send in the results just as soon as possible.

Let those societies that have not as yet indicated their intention to help, take an offering for this work. We have this month and next, and a part of September, in which to gather up our offerings, and Let the societies that have made a pledge to the work not having agreed to observe the day be sure that their offering is in early. It is not best to wait until the very last of September to send it in. It will give the work an impetus to have it in now, and it will be better in every way, to have an early payment as the year is now far gone. So let the societies that have made a pledge bestir themselves and send in their money.

All societies that have contributed $10 and over, will receive a Centennial Certificate. These certificates are to be signed by the president of the board, the corresponding secretary, the field secretary, and the Centennial secretary. The corresponding secretary has been out of the office for some time, and we have to await his return for his signature, but the certificates will be sent out some time during July. When your certificate comes, show it to the church, as well as to the Endeavor Society, and have it framed and hung up in the Endeavor room.

Now is the time to follow up the interest in Inland Empire Day, and secure the largest results possible. We must work if we reach that $10,000 aim. The societies, so far, have not averaged $10 per society, therefore, we are going to need more than a thousand societies to reach the $10,000 aim. Let us have the loyal support of every Endeavor Society.

If you have a place in the next two months, for the program prepared for Inland Empire Day, June 28, it would be a good idea to render the program if you have not already observed the day. If you have not the supplies, let us know, and we will send you supplies at once. We must make this unanimous.

O. F. JORDAN LECTURES AT WEST PULLMAN.

O. F. Jordan delivered his illustrated lecture on "The Lights and Shadows of a Great City" in our church here recently. The lecture was well attended and very much appreciated. Bro. Jordan has been at great pains and labor in securing the splendid and well-chosen views presented. The great objects of interest in Chicago—educational, architectural, commercial, and industrial—were exhibited in a most interesting manner. The lecture gives a most enlightening exhibit of the religious institutions of the city, our own and those of other religious bodies. While not attempting to discuss exhaustively, the lecturer does touch suggestively upon the great problems of our city life. This lecture will be received with interest and profit in Chicago and the section of which it is the center.

the government.' Yet he was a good workman and we didn't want to discharge him.

"So we fixed up another way of taming him. We made an arrangement by which he could buy a cozy home on installments. We crowded it on him all we dared to, and he took the bargain. The plan worked like a charm. He hasn't talked anarchy since. There isn't a milder man in the whole establishment today than our ex-anarchist property-holder."—The Interior.

WESTWARD HO!

On Sunday, May 31, I closed my work in Olympia and regretfully bade farewell to the brave and genial souls of the congregation with whom I had labored so successfully for more than six years, proud with them in the spiritual and material advancement of the work there, due to their thorough and hearty co-operation in all that counted for the advancement of the cause.

On Sunday, June 6, I commenced my labors in the Wallowa valley in northeastern Oregon with the town of Wallowa as my headquarters. I am not entirely a "stranger in a strange land" for at Wallowa, Dr. Laurence George, an earnest coworker in Olympia, has opened dental parlors.

Readers of a Chicago paper are naturally of the class to whom the above caption appeals, for scarce a generation has elapsed since it was the rallying cry for those who have built an empire around the Great Lakes with this city as the metropolis.

Yet, to the people of the section under our notice now, Chicago seems the effete, if not extreme east. Only a few hundred miles of lofty mountains, pathless forests and fertile valleys separate Wallowa county from the broad Pacific.

Wallowa, the northeastern county in the state of Oregon, comprises within its borders all those elements of industrial and agricultural wealth which has made this the foremost country in material progress and achievement. Here at hand are all the materials for agricultural, pastoral, manufacturing and mining pursuits that have formed the basis of our growth as a nation.

Its climatic conditions vary with varying altitudes and the grains and grasses of the temperate zone thrive in its various sections. The scenery varies from the sublime to the beautiful as its opportunities vary from the extensive farming of the highly improved irrigated portions to the free range life of its stock raising sections. All these opportunities await the settler. Beautiful homes on highly improved farms may be bought at reasonable prices and the more venturesome, or less favored financially, may find still cheaper lands upon which the rapid advancement and the coming transportation facilities marks a material shortening of the pioneering period.

The government of Oregon has always been conservative and taxes and expenses are kept at the minimum of effective service. It is strictly up-to-date in political economy and the power is vested in the people as in no other state. As a result of this power Wallowa county is "dry," having carried local option by a large majority. As they have protected the homes, so have they built up the schools and churches.

The educational endowment is liberal. Each county must supplement the state apportionment to make the portion of each child a liberal one and liberal district apportionment is the rule. Teachers are well paid and the schools of the county cover everything up to a college or university course, and in religion the leading denominations are well represented and liberally supported.

With the completion of the railroad this fall Wallowa county, long remote from transportation, will go forward with leaps and bounds and those to whom the cry of "Westward, Ho" appeals would do well to make an early investigation.

As to further detail, I shall be pleased to answer any inquiries of our people, to furnish them with more detailed information of a general character, such as published by the local papers and furnished by the county or special information in answer to particular points in which they may be interested.

features of the next International Christian Endeavor Convention to be held in St. Paul, Minn., July 7-12, 1909, as outlined at the annual meeting of the United Society and its Board of Trustees held in Boston, Wednesday, June 10.

It is to be a demonstration, on a scale never before attempted, of the progress of moral reforms, and the power of Christian truth in transforming the lives and conditions of men.

Another unique and interesting feature of the convention designed to challenge the attention of the non-churchgoing masses will be a monster street parade in the Twin Cities, in which all the available electric cars, automobiles, and bicycles will be pressed into service. Foreign countries, states, and provinces represented in the convention will have characteristic decorations and designs.

The central theme of the convention will be "The Coming of the Kingdom."

President Francis E. Clark, of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, said in his annual report:

'The year has been marked by the development of the Patriots' League through the efforts of Mr. Coleman, and the addition to our force of Rev. R. P. Anderson, who has taken hold vigorously of the Builders' Union, the funds for which have been materially increased.

"Turning to the wide field of Christian Endeavor in other lands, there is much to encourage and nothing to dishearten. In every continent and in almost every section of every continent Christian Endeavor is making headway.

"A new field secretary will soon sail for China, called by the United Society of China. From South America, Australia, South Africa and Japan, as well as from almost every country of Europe, good progress is reported.

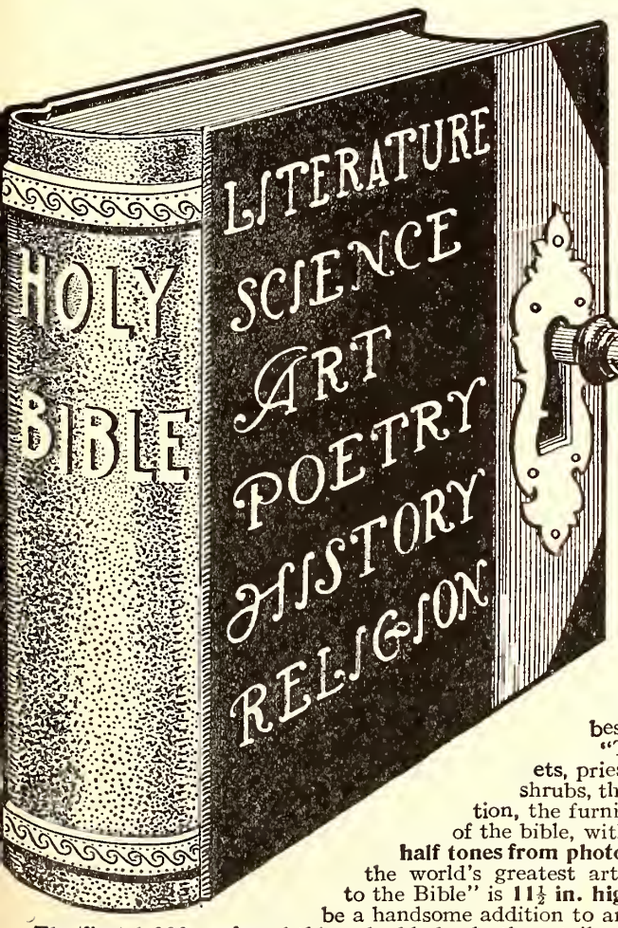
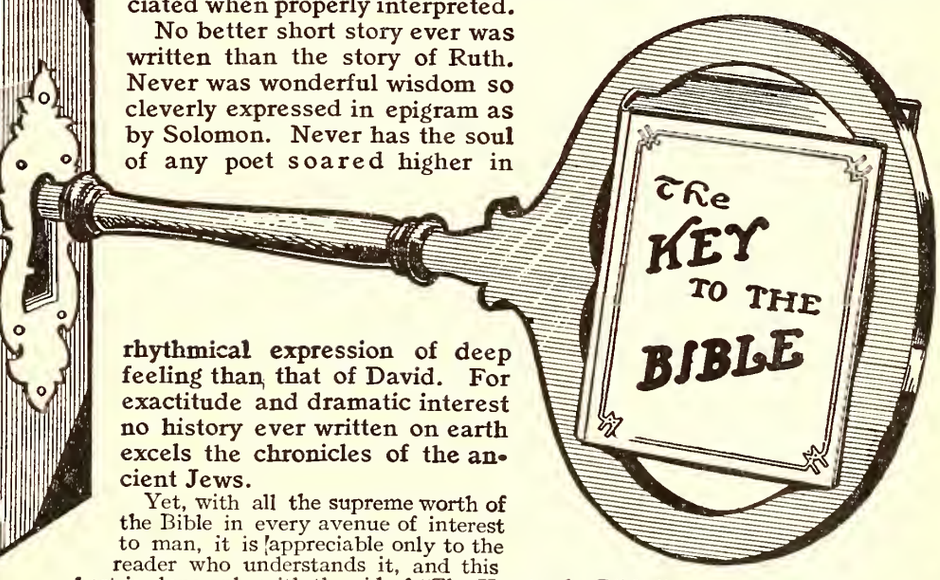
THIS MONTH ONLY---The Key to the Bible, advertised below, together with the Christian Century to a new subscriber for 6 months for Only Two Dollars.

The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.



Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples, houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

I enclose $3.00 for one copy of "The Key to the Bible" to be sent prepaid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Churches thrive by the blessings which they diffuse to others. They are never so strong at home as when they are employing their strength wide abroad through the world. That church which is only taking care of itself will die of selfishness. That church which is co-operating with God for the whole world will go, in the power of God, from strength to strength.

Altar Stairs

By JUDGE, CHARLES J. SCOFIELD, Author of A Subtle Adversary. Square 12mo., cloth. Beautifully designed cover, back and side title stamped in gold. Illustrated, $1.20.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

The story will not only entertain all readers, but will also impart many valuable moral lessons. This is an age of story reading and the attention of the young especially, should be called to such books of fiction as "Altar Stairs."

EDITORIAL

Christian Union.

What Baptists are Saying.

Errett Gates.

Concerning the union of the First Christian and the Memorial Baptist churches in Chicago, the Western Recorder, a Baptist newspaper has the following to say:

"The only common ground between Baptists and Disciples is that both regard immersion as essential to baptism. They are antipodes on depravity, the Holy Spirit, regeneration, repentance, faith, experience of grace, intent in baptism, and apostasy.

"This union furnishes a striking argument in favor of the wholesome need of faithful and intelligent doctrinal preaching. Had the Baptist or Disciple congregations understood the distinctive principles for which they stood this union would never have been consummated. "We venture suggestion that Baptists will make no mistake if they regard the Memorial Church as lost to the denomination."

The editor of the Western Recorder must be acquainted with a particular kind of Disciples and Baptists if he has found them "antipodes" apart on such fundamental doctrines as are mentioned. There are all kinds of Baptists and all kinds of Disciples. The Baptists are at "antipodes" among themselves on some of these doctrines, and so are the Disciples. The editor might better have said that some Disciples and some Baptists are at antipodes. The writer has met Baptists and Disciples who were in perfect agreement upon the essential doctrines of Christianity. Would there be any objections to their coming together in organic union? The Baptists of the Memorial Baptist Church and the Disciples of the First Christian Church found themselves in entire agreement. I take it that under such a condition the editor would advise organic union. But not so; he goes on to say that the Memorial church should be considered as lost to the denomination.

But if these two churches were not ready for union when will churches ever be ready for it? When the editors consent to it? or when both the denominations unanimously agree to it? Then union between Baptists and Disciples would never begin, for all the editors on both sides will never consent to it, and there will never come a time when every one in both denominations will be ready for it. If the progressive wing of the Disciples could agree to such a union, the anti-organ Disciples would withhold consent until the splendid pipe organ in Memorial church were taken out. If the regular Baptists would agree to it, then the Hardshell Baptists would object until all the Disciples were re-baptized.

It is fortunate for the beginnings of the reunion of the two bodies that they are congregational in form of government. Local churches can thus consult their own local needs and interests, and make them primary in their consideration, as they should. Why should Baptist churches in New York or London dictate to a Baptist church in Chicago what it shall do, as far as its local work and policy are concerned? If one Baptist church departs from the faith and practice of other Baptist churches then it ceases to be a Baptist church. But here is a Baptist church in Chicago that has in no particular departed from Baptist faith and practice and still claims Baptist fellowship. It has united with other Christians who agree in faith and practice with it, to do Christ's work the more effectively. How has it violated any obligation belonging to the Baptist fellowship as a whole?

The first business of a Baptist or a Christian church in Chicago is to bring men in Chicago, who are neighbors and fellow citizens, into right relations with each other, and with God, and not to keep Baptists or Disciples in good standing and full fellowship with Baptists and Disciples in New York. In other words a church's first duty is to its own community and then to the unsaved in other lands.

The "denominational interest" to which appeal has been made to stop any further union of Baptist and Christian churches, holds the same relation to universal Christian interests that "corporate interests" hold to popular interests. Every local church has a bigger interest to serve than that of the denomination with which it is in fellowship. Sometimes the universal interest conflicts with the denominational though no thorough denominationalist ever confesses it. To him the sect is the Kingdom of God, and the growth of the sect is the coming of the Kingdom, and the only coming of it he knows anything about. Whoever heard of a street railway corporation regarding the loss of its franchise as anything else but a "loss to the corporation"? Tell the corporation that it is a gain to the people, and it will respond, "To H—— with the people."

Of course the universal church, the Kingdom of God, is not very definitely organized—it can not make its demands visibly felt. It is "righteousness, joy, and peace, in the Holy Spirit." It is brotherhood, and the coming of brotherhood among Christians is just as clearly a coming of the Kingdom as a coming of brotherhood among other men. Brotherhood is unity and peace. Any breaking down of walls of separation among Christians, any bringing together of the estranged is a coming of the Kingdom, and an answer of Christ's prayer for unity. Because we can not answer it largely and signally, we should not be deterred from answering as we can.

The "All India Baptist Conference" of Missionaries held in March, 1908, passed the following resolutions:

"1. That this conference heartily approves of holding a congress representing Baptists and Disciples and all allied bodies in India, Burma and Ceylon, in 1912."

"2. That it is the opinion of this conference that steps should be taken to form a union of Baptists, Disciples and allied bodies in India, Burma and Ceylon." Thus it seems again that the missionary churches upon foreign soil are the quickest to recognize the folly and evil of our sectarian divisions. Christian union is destined to come first upon the foreign field, and to force the home churches for very shame to put away their petty differences and sectarian pride.

"First Fruits."

Our subscribers will rejoice with us over the first fruits of the new arrangement which The Century has made in moving into the new building devoted to religious journals. The United Religious Press building is occupied by the journals of four different denominations, thus realizing in a practical way something of the true spirit of Christian union. As a large number of local church papers are published here we are in the very center of Christian journalism in the West and able to take advantage of many courtesies. The Christian Century Company is by no means free from financial problems, in fact, we are still looking to some friends to help us meet a financial crisis next month, but meantime we are able to greatly improve the typography and make-up of the paper, thus bringing it more into harmony with the best modern journalism; also we are beginning this week a new serial story which will be greatly appreciated.

Business Manager.

Japan Makes Innovations in Forest Movement.

Japan is the only government in the world which takes upon itself the working of its lumber business, according to Consul General Henry B. Miller, of Yokohama, in a report in which he quotes the director of the Japanese Forest Bureau.

The Mikado's government has set apart a quarter of a million dollars to build sawmills and lumber roads, manufacture lumber in remote districts, and put it on the market. Except railroad ties for Manchuria roads, the Japanese government exports no timber. It is all needed at home.

Correspondence on the Religious Life

George A. Campbell.

The Correspondent:—"Why is it that the children who are taught religion the most scrupulously often break with it in their adult years? Preachers' children are proverbially careless as to church life. The faith which is the very life of the parents is frequently totally ignored by their children. The home teaching seems in these cases to count for nothing. The child totally neglected so far as parental oversight is concerned frequently finds his way to a vital religion. Wherein lies wisdom in the culture of the child?"

Every individual is distinct. The soul of the child does not belong to the parent but to God. Every man of us must find God in his own way. The religion of the parent cannot be handed down to his child. If it could it would not be religion. You can deed property but not faith. The imaginative and practical boy must not be forced to the mathematical formulas of his father. He must have room or he will rebel. The prosaic would save himself many heartaches if he could be appreciative of the fire and faith of the mystic.

A soul is the most awful and delicate thing in this universe. It is the divine life in man. Life—that is the word. Life so strange and yet so familiar, so commonplace and yet so illusive; so vulgar and yet so transcendent; so dull, yet so passionately wild; so visible, and yet so darkly invisible; so sure and yet so fragile and uncertain; so largely physical and yet so wholly spiritual; so fixed to earth; yet so eternal and independent in the mighty sweeps of its imagination. Oh! Life! divine Life! We must mark its infinite variety in the children who come trailing clouds of glory after them. Let the parent meditate upon this life of God in his child and know that he can do it no wrong without serious consequences. The parent's business is not to put his own creed in the soul of his child; but to guard its God-life so that it may have full and free development. The child is to be taught; but not sectarianly taught. There must be a large margin of freedom. The soul is the most important thing in the universe. It belongs to God. It is the heir of all the past. Heredity, the law of which seems so capricious may have given the soul of a Tauler to the son of a Pharisee. Some spiritual grandmother may have been the real ancestor through whom God endowed the boy. The father will err in thinking the boy ought to be a reproduction of himself. If the child is to be a real spiritual soul he must come to have a faith of his own. Every individual experience will be his teacher. Every suffering and every joy; every defeat and every victory, every sin and every prayer, and every enemy and every friend will have their bearing to fix for him his soul in God's universe. Happy for him when his parents can give him not forced but delicate and sympathetic direction. The average religious parents are too listless and lazy to understand the souls of their children. They talk to them as if they had the understanding of men. It is a serious blunder to so indifferently deal with the immortal minds of the young. It is sinful to cramp the religious imagination of a child, more sinful than to bind the feet as the Chinese do. Religion is good, romantic, ghostly, never dull, tender, motherly, imaginative, and exacting as nature. It has given us the best of stories, music and pictures. Christianity supports laughter. "Oh the Joy of Living" is the shout had has come from the Cross. It is so and the child ought to be taught that it is so. Thus shall the parent save the child and the child the parent. The home ought to ever be an atmosphere of light, the light of o happy religion. The child will not likely break with that which serves its best life.

"Father and Son."

This book is published anonymously in England and imported by Scribners. It is the story of a tragic break over religion between father and son. The parents were both "Plymouth" Brethren. The father was an authority in geology. Huxley called him a "hodman of Science." He was good on detail; but missed the larger language of his field. In religion he was a hard loyalist. There was no smile in his religion. All was law and nothing was love. In religion he walked by the sight of the literalist and not by the faith of the mystic. His religion to him was the only true one. His small sect contained all truth. God in his mercy might save other good people, but he had not covenanted to do so. The son was raised among the "saints." He had no companions—was not allowed to read any fiction. He was assidously taught the letter of the Bible. But its poetry was not interpreted to him. He was baptised early, before he knew what the life of man was. He did some pastoral work for his father. The "saints" were odd, some of them grotesque. The softer lights did not fall upon their rigid lines. The boy talked beyond his experience. He talked like a "Saint" when he was but a boy—a dangerous procedure. His mother died when he was but eight, and on her deathbed dedicated him to the informal ministry of the "Brethren". A step-mother who was an Episcopalian, but afterwards by much insistence on the part of the father, was immersed and became one of the saved, understood him better and brings some humanity into his raising. But the most of his young life seems to have been devoid of childhood because of the hard religious system so strictly held to by his parents.

The father loved the boy and passionately labored to raise him in the narrow faith of the Brethren. But he failed. When the son came to himself he had gone far from the father, and the father's heart was sore, tragically sore. The biographer who is the son says: What a charming companion, what a delightful parent, what a courageous and engaging friend, my father would have been, and would pre-eminently have been to me, if it had not been for this stringent piety which ruined it all..... Let me speak plainly. After my long experience, after my patience and forbearance, I have surely a right to protest against the untruth—that evangelical religion, or any religion in a violent form, is a wholesome or valuable or desirable adjunct to human life. It divides heart from heart. It sets up a vain, chimerical ideal in the barren pursuit of which all the tender, indulgent affections, all the genial play of life, all the exquisite pleasures and soft resignations of the body, all that enlarges and calms the soul, are exchanged for what is harsh and void and negative. It encourages a stern and ignorant spirit of condemnation; it throws altogether out of gear the healthy movement of the conscience; it invents virtues which are sterile and cruel; it invents sins which are no sins at all, but which darken the heaven of innocent joy with futile clouds of remorse."

Can we be earnest in our religion without being fanatically violent?

Surely it is true that to overload the child with the encumbrances of a foreign or a parental creed is to endanger his loyality and devotion in later years.

The Spectator concludes its review of "Father and Son" with the following suggestive paragraph:

The Complaint of Tomorrow.

The occasional clash of the generations at moments of transition, is as inevitable as the natural affections between parents and children. Those of us who are not yet old may probably live to read a similar book on opposite lines. Already the social observer may see indications of a turn in the tide. Certain children are now brought up upon an exactly opposite system to the one held up for condemnation in this book. Will they ever complain to their parents? It is more than likely. "I was," we can imagine some future autobiographer lamenting, "the dearly loved child of an excellent father and mother. My health and my happiness were never out of their thoughts. I was shielded from every hardship, and there was always someone to turn my thoughts from every distress. No burden was put on my conscience. Even the difference between right and wrong was slurred over lest a hard and fast rule should narrow my sympathies or cramp my imagination. Meanwhile my spiritual nature was starved. The book and the toy shop were ransacked to make me happy. All that love or money could do was done for me. Yet I was sad. The spectre was that secularity overshadowed my life.

" 'My nurse was forbidden to speak to me of religion. If I asked about the soul my mother changed the subject. When I pondered upon the whence and the whither, I was fibbed off with fairy tales. I saw other children going to church and I longed to go, but was not allowed. 'Church,' I was told, 'would not interest me.' Was I frightened at night, my mother altered my supper-hour and talked to me of indigestion. Not even the comfort of the conventional guardian angel was left me. When my dearest friend died no one spoke to me of heaven, and I remember once hearing my father and mother discussing the desirability of sending me to the seaside 'to help me to forget.' Thus I grew up alone. More and more divided from those who could not share my highest and most intimate thoughts, in the end the breach was inevitable, and alas, the gulf between us widened. The tragedy was real, all else was superficial, etc. etc."

The Spirit of Religious Journalism.

Will F. Shaw.

It is the will of Christ that his disciples receive his Spirit—that Spirit essential to the solution of the world's problems, to the apprehension of all truth. In truly religious journalism the Master's Spirit will be sought as the solvent in questions social, moral, religious, philosophic, psychologic, theologic, ad categorandum. Opinions may vary in direct ratio with the multiplication of media of communication, but that one Spirit must control the output of press, as well as of pulpit, is becoming a common sense of the follower of Christ.

Moreover, the Spirit which directs the disciple of our Lord to his unreconciled brother before offering his gift is today knocking loud and long at the editorial sanctum with the divine request that brothers of the press, as meekly as brethren of the pew, make mutual overtures toward perfect understanding and reconciliation before telling it to the entire brotherhood, or rushing like knights of old, with lances poised—but unlike heroic knights, with lances poisoned into the lists of fratridical conflict. The disintegration of Christian reputation or character is not the acme of any journalism. Religious journalism no more should engage in deadly antithesis than apostles of Christ. Their house divided is a bottomless tub through which the waters of doctrinal and differential conceit waste upon the soil.

Herein lies the need of a representative press—one that shall reflect the spirit of an entire Brotherhood and the Master. The Gospels reflect not only the Spirit of the Son of God—they reflect the Spirit of the inner man, of brotherhood—and therein is the double authority of the Christ, letter and Spirit. A press voicing the common spirit of a common people, controlled by the Spirit of Christ would be invincible.

In fundamentals, in life principles, in accepted truths, in Scriptural statements of fact, in Christ's commands, our papers must speak essentially the same thing, or degenerate into a phonographic Babel for which the confused or amused crowd pays its nickel and takes individually its choice.

In consideration of our correspondent's disparagement in the comparative planes of religious journalism, in response to the suggested "scramble for existence," may we not ask if the experiment of vicarious journalism has not been sufficiently tried? The press is no more venal than the pulpit. It needs men who may give themselves, as to the world, wholly to its ministry and as in the preaching of the Word, they who print should live thereby. Temptation to unsafe investment by the inexperienced, unsophisticated, uninformed or overinformed in religious journalism, rare as it may have been, too seriously impairs confidence in our publications to long delay the project of a representative press baeked by the means of a constituency whose honor, whose financial ability and integrity should be as integral as its teachings, and whose responsibility would be co-extensive with the fraternal output and benefit accruing.

The voice of Jesus as it came to Peter repeatedly appeals, "Feed my sheep." Whatever the sesquipedalian, terminologicals, whatever dissertations on opinionated liberty, whatever the illimitable category of recent and indispensable bibliography, whatever the stage of evolutionary and critical hypotheses rejuvenated to date, sane journalism neglects not its Master's triple mandate for food. Or, while the one safely lies in the subscription fold, the ninety and nine as safely break the fence and find pasturage elsewhere: for most people, like sheep, know pasture when they see it. Feed: "Line upon line, precept upon precept; here a little and there", not a mighty little! Chapter by chapter—not a few desultory verses—but all of John's beautiful Gospel. Our papers convey the only Gospel of John to some homes; "if the light within them be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

Teacher training courses for those who ean not classify—the busy nighttoilers; trainmen, milk-venders, night watchmen, postal clerks—industrial slaves to whom Sunday's rest and special classes never come. Give us a toiler's Bible commentary, Bible outlines, Book analyses, condensed sermonettes for the non-church-goer, devotional literature; the devotional spirit, until one comes from the reading of his religious paper as from converse with God; feeling like prayer, like work, like praise, like searching his Bible, and not for a club to brain his belligerent brethren; feeling that in all the darkness and cloud of life here has been a rift through which has shone the star of hope; feeling that clusters of grapes from a land of promise, and not lemons, have been handed him with flowers from Eden and a breath from Paradise. He gets enough of suicide and moroseness and sordidness from the dailies. Doubts, foibles, inconstancies and prognostications may be had for the copper morning or night; he seeks in his religious reverie, a definite message for his daily life.

The cry for "constructive irenicon" is as old and virile as the Pauline declarations: "Knowledge puffs up!" "Love builds up." And the Holy Spirit still stands guard over forms of sound word and doctrine in sacred text and reverent oratory.

The worth of a paper, like that of a person is not measured entirely by size nor vocabulary. What facts, what truths are most worth?" may be more vaguely represented in sixty pages than in sixteen. To supply religious needs and point to religious duty and opportunity—"to bear witness to the truth"—that is of most worth.

Two-Fold Plea and a Double Demand for Men.

There is a sufficient reason for the falling off in attendance at the Theological Seminaries. There is not a denominational plea before the world for which a twentieth century young man would die. The ministry of the Gospel is a holy military service. It offers opportunity for sacrifice. It appeals to the heroic. If one has not enough of imagination to see the chances for heroic service in the home land, the romance of foreign missions is an open book. If the recruiting agents of the Kingdom are not crowded with applicants, it is prima facie evidence that they are not recruiting stations of the Kingdom at all.

In the year of one hundred years we must look well to our supply of preachers, and particularly to the numbers that are volunteering. It is not merely that we have three thousand vacant churches, and two thousand open fields calling for men, but we ourselves are facing a judgment day. We are on trial before the coming generation. As we face our Centennial, the young men of the next century's first quarter are deciding whether we are really speaking the words of God and doing the works of God in the world or not. If they find us true to the plea of a hundred years ago they will rally to the banner we uphold. If not they will pass us by inexorably. The judgment of the young man is without mercy.

There is less excuse for any failure on our part, because we have inherited from our fathers a two-fold plea that ought to reach the heart and fire the spirit of America's young men. There is the plea for the union of God's people, which ought to be as irresistible a call as Abraham Lincoln's alarm for the union of the states. Then the plea for world-wide evangelism is ours. The old guarantee of the Christ stands, "And I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." By our fruits in these two regards the new generation is judging us. In the day of our glorious Centennial opportunity may we not be found wanting.

IN THE TOILS OF FREEDOM

BY ELLA N. WOOD

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER I.

The Land of the Free.

"HERE'S a green 'un for you, Mr. Breaker Boss," said Garry McFee, pausing before that worthy gentleman and exhibiting a small boy whom he held by the hand.

"What! this milk-faced baby? They are running so many little kids into the breaker these days that one might take it for a nursery."

"Well, you know you are partly to blame for that, seein' you issued an order for fifty more breaker boys," said Garry.

"Hold your mouth, young man, and get to work. I don't propose to be told by you what I am to blame for."

"What's your name?" said the breaker boss, turning to the small boy.

"Jean Kirklin, sir."

"How old are you?"

"Eight going on nine."

"Well, you are a kid. Here, put this on," and the boss handed Jean an old coat which was several sizes too large for him. "You will need this to keep you warm," he said, but in his own mind he thought, "He will not look so small with this coat on and I will send him high up on the breaker, for that little chap won't bear close inspection yet awhile, but we will soon put some color on his face," and he gave an inward chuckle.

"Please, sir, may I sit with my brother?" said Jean to the boss.

"O bother your brother! You'll work better if you sit with somebody that won't baby you."

Jean followed the boss out of the office into the great, noisy breaker. It was the first time he had ever been inside and he looked curiously up into the high tower, to the top of which the lump coal is carried by elevators, where it is crushed to the desired size by heavy machinery, and then runs zigzag down through long chutes to the spouts by which it is loaded on the car. As his short legs climbed up the breaker after the boss, he saw long rows of boys sitting on each side of the chutes, busy picking the pieces of slate from the coal as it traveled down. Up and up they climbed until Jean's limbs were weary and it seemed as if they would never stop. At last, almost at the top, the breaker boss stopped in front of a burly German boy with a hard face and a wicked eye and said, "Here Pete, is a youngster I want you to break in. You just see that he keeps busy."

Jean had all he could do to keep back the tears as he looked longingly down the interminable rows of breaker seats for a glimpse of his brother Nelson, but in vain. Then he bravely dashed his hands over his eyes and sat down on the rough board bench by the side of Pete Schneider to begin his first day as a breaker boy, while the breaker boss walked back and forth in front of the chutes and watched the boys as intently as they did the coal. Pete immediately began a steady flow of foul talk such as Jean had never heard in all his young life before. The vilest oaths and most indecent language fell from his lips, frequently accompanied with a slap on Jean's shoulders or a punch in his ribs that almost took his breath away.

The hours wore on, Jean's shoulders ached and his head was dizzy from looking steadily at the constantly moving coal and listening to the unceasing roar of the breaker. His fingers felt as if they would freeze, but he could wear nothing on his hands, for the slate could only be grasped quickly enough with the bare fingers.

"Don't they ever stop to let the boys rest?" he ventured to ask Pete.

"Oh, you softy; talk about rest! why it's two hours yet till noon and you only get to rest a half hour then. Bully place this is to rest. Better bring your cradle along tomorrow and I'll rock you awhile."

Pete kept on with his jibes and Jean bent lower over the coal so that he would not see the tears that could not be kept back.

"You wait till noon, you baby, and you will be tireder than you are now after we get you initiated. Us breaker boys always initiate youngsters; they hain't no good till after they are initiated."

Jean's heart quaked; what could they mean to do to him? The noon whistle blew and the boys poured out of the breaker. Nelson had the lunch for both in his dinner pail, and had expected to meet Jean at the foot of the breaker, but could not find him. So, assisted by two or three of the more friendly, he searched diligently in every direction, but it was almost time to go back to work when a small figure slipped from behind the breaker.

"Where in the world have you been, Jean?" asked Nelson. "We have been looking everywhere for you."

"Oh Nelson, I hid. The big boy in the breaker seat with me said they was going to initiate me."

"Oh Jean, that was just his talk. The boys won't hurt you, and you might just as well get used to them one time as another. Come, eat a bite."

Jean took the bread Nelson handed him, but he found it hard to swallow.

"Nelson, won't you ask the boss if I can't sit with you?"

"It wouldn't do any good, Jean; he wouldn't let you. If he finds out a boy wants anything, he takes mighty good care that he don't get it."

As the afternoon wore on, even Pete grew less talkative. The unceasing work in the breaker will quell the spirit of the strongest boys.

Jean's back felt as if he could never straighten it again, and his poor little fingers were bleeding. Oh, how they hurt! Would he ever get home where "mither" could tie them up?

At last the little body gave out and Jean went to sleep with his head hanging over the bench; but a rude rap with a long stick which the breaker boss always carried, awakened him.

"You milk-faced baby, wake up there! What do you think you are here for? We hire boys to work, not sleep. Now get lively and don't let me see any more napping."

Jean found out afterward that this was no unusual thing; that the long hours of constant bending over the black coal as it ran down the chute, would now and then prove too much for a boy and he would go to sleep, only to be rudely roused by a blow from the breaker boss.

Jean's first day in the breaker came to an end. When he got home, "mither" washed the little sore hands and tied them up with soothing ointment, then she held her boy in her arms and talked to him until he felt that he could go to the breaker every day and sit by Pete Schneider, and never run away and hide again.

"I can do this for mither. Did she not call me her little man?" thought Jean to himself as he crept into bed.

His second day in the breaker was much like the first, only the slender fingers were tender and swollen and the pain in his poor little back was almost unbearable. Pete's tongue ran a little faster and was more foul and bitter than the day before. Jean almost wished that the breaker would roar a little louder so he could not hear him. Never for a moment could he straighten up or slacken his search for the passing slate; the slightest tendency to either would bring a cruel rap from the ever vigilant breaker boss.

Three weary days passed and Jean was going into the breaker to begin his fourth, when the boss told him to go to the office.

Jean stood as if paralyzed, his face white and scared and his big eyes looking straight into the face of the boss.

"Fool! What's the matter with you? Get a move on you and don't stand there like a gop!" and with a push that sent Jean headlong he turned to another. Jean picked himself up and started toward the office.

"What can they be going to do with me?" was his thought. "What have I done to make them send me there? I have tried so hard to do it all right, and I never went to sleep once yesterday. I know I couldn't work quite so fast because my fingers are so sore and mither tied them up. What will they do to me?" and so he passed into the office and slid sideways into a chair in a corner of the room, a pitiful little figure. There were four or five other boys in the room and a man sitting at a desk writing. After what seemed to Jean a very long time he wheeled around in his chair and looked with a stern face at the boys, then picking up a slip of paper asked if Jose Kolner was in the room. A shrinking form slowly rose and went forward. He had no more than reached the desk when he began to cough. The paroxysm was so long and severe that the boy took hold of the desk to support his frail body.

"Well, did you get that up for my benefit?" asked the man with a sneer.

The boy, trying to restrain another attack of coughing, mumbled "No, sir."

"What gave you such a cough, and how long have you had it?"

"I've been coughin' for over a year, and Doctor Jones says I catched it in the breaker 'cause it's so cold and dusty there," replied Jose.

"Blast Doctor Jones! He is the biggest fool in this state, and if he did not coddle you breaker boys quite so much you would be worth twice as much. Stop that coughing and get out of here. We don't want any such weaklings in the breaker. Is Sandy Kalkara in the room?"

A boy about twelve years old stood up.

"Come here!" commanded the man at the desk, and Sandy hobbled over toward him. The boy's body was drawn and twisted, his shoulders stooped and his coal-blacked hands looked like gnarled and stiffened claws.

"Well, you are a handsome specimen! Wasn't you told not to come to the breaker any more?"

(Copyright, 1905, Ella N. Wood.)

"Yes, sir," replied the boy.

"Well, what in thunder are you here for?"

"My father made me come."

"Hold out your hands."

Sandy held out his claw-like hands and one would have thought the pitiful sight would have drawn sympathy from a heart of adamant, but it only seemed to anger the man in the chair, for he struck them away from him and wrathfully exclaimed, "Your father is a fool! What he thinks you are good for is more than I can tell! Why them hands could not hold a piece of slate if it walked right into them. How long have you been this way?"

"Over a year, sir."

The little boy was so scared that his answers were brief and in a very low voice.

"Speak up! I don't want any sniveling here. How long have you been in the breaker?"

"Nearly three years, sir."

"Was you this way when you came here?"

"Oh, no, sir! I had rheumatis' a year ago."

"Well, now you take yourself away from this breaker and don't ever let me see your face here again. And tell your father that if he ever sends you back he will get his discharge, too."

Poor Sandy hung his head and hobbled out of the room.

"Is the Kirklin boy here?"

The question was so sharp and abrupt that Jean sprang from his seat and stood trembling before the official.

"What's the matter with you?"

"Nothing, sir," said Jean.

"Then what have you got your fingers tied up for?"

"Oh, Mister, they got so sore in the breaker that I couldn't stand it," and Jean put his offending hands behind him.

"Now, young man, I've heard about enough complaints about the breaker for one day, and I want you to understand that this breaker is not a hospital nor a place for tied-up fingers, nor for babies that can't stand anything. How long have you been in the breaker?"

"Three days," replied Jean, and he winked hard to keep back the tears.

"Let me see them hands."

Jean held out the poor tied-up fingers and they were roughly taken hold of and the cloths rudely torn off, which set the fingers to bleeding again.

"Now you go back to your seat in the breaker, and don't let me hear of any more tied-up hands. You are there to pick the slate from the coal with bare hands. Do you understand that?"

"Yes, sir," and Jean turned away with the bloody fingers wiping the tears from his eyes.

How Jean got through the day with his poor, suffering hands he never knew, but it came to an end at last and as he and Nelson were going home, they saw Sandy sitting beside an old tumble-down building at the foot of the culm heap.

"Why, Sandy, what are you doing there?" asked Nelson as they went up to him.

"I'm afraid to go home, for my father will beat me," replied Sandy.

"Oh, surely your father won't beat your poor crippled back. Come and go home," and Nelson took Sandy's hand and tried to lift him up.

"No, I won't go home. I wish I was dead. Oh, I wish I would die tonight!" and Sandy buried his head in his arms and his frame was shaken with sobs.

"What will your mother do if you don't come home?" asked Jean.

"I—hain't—got—no mo—ther," was the sobbing reply.

"Oh, poor Sandy! Come along home with us."

No answer came from the stricken boy, and Jean and Nelson stood by and looked at him helplessly for a few minutes, then turned and went on home.

One morning a few days after this, the body of poor, crippled Sandy Kalkara was found at the bottom of a shaft. Did he, in his wanderings, accidentally fall into the open mouth, or did he purposely end his poor, useless life that had been spoiled by the merciless breaker?

As Jean trudged on to his work, he saw the men carrying what was left of Sandy to his mean little home, and he wondered if he, too, would "ketch the rheumatis' and get twisted up like Sandy," but the roar of the breaker and the unceasing toil soon dispelled any thought of Sandy or the outside world.

CHAPTER II.

Caught in the Toils.

The crowd at the postoffice in Glen Muir was listening with eager attention to the recruiting agent as he told in glowing terms of the big wages, free schools and beautiful houses furnished by the Gordon Mining Company in Pennsylvania to its employes.

"I tell you, men, you don't know what it means to live. We do things over in America. Why, if a man has a mind to he can just about pick up a fortune at his very door. Over here you are every one laborers, ground down to a regular servitude. And what is your pay? A mere pittance. A bare living."

"Another thing," here the agent grew confidential, "the miner Perhaps the Gordon Mining Company would not have thanked the agent for throwing out this inducement, but the seed fell on fertile ground and as Hugh Kirklin and Joe McFee walked home that evening the fruit of discontent began to ripen.

just holds the company in his hands. If he wants higher wages and shorter hours all he has to do is to 'strike,' and the company is usually ready enough to come to terms."

Hugh's step quickened as he drew near his home and he saw the little vine-clad cottage nestled among the Scottish downs, the fields dotted with sheep and cattle stretching into a purple haze beyond, and best of all, Maidie, his bonnie wife, standing in the door, her girlish beauty aglow with health and happiness, and then as the voices of his boys came out to him as they shouted in their play, the golden dream that had been awakened by the recruiting agent vanished. Joe McFee, divining Hugh's thoughts, reinforced his arguments and stopped at the cottage to tell to Maidie in thrilling terms the wonderful report, laying special emphasis on the splendid school system in the United States. Joe knew she was set on educating her boys, and that this would appeal to her strongly.

Maidie Kirklin was the only child of Mr. Drummore, who had been dominie of the Free Kirk in Glen Muir for twenty years. As her father's constant companion and idol she had had many advantages and her education was much above that of the peasantry about her, and now her whole purpose in life was to educate her boys and fit them for the men she wished them to become.

This was seven years before the events in the preceding chapter. They had come to America. The "beautiful home" furnished by the company was only a miner's hut in the Black Acre. Hugh had never been able to realize the big wages, for an accident in the mines had laid him up for weeks and had left him lame, so that he could not compete with stronger men. They had of necessity gone in debt to the company during Hugh's sickness, and were compelled to trade at the company's store, where the prices for provisions and blasting powder were exorbitant, and it was with despair in her heart that Maidie had at last sent her little Jean off to the breaker. Tears blinded her eyes as she tied his scarf about his neck, then took the little hands in her own as though she would keep them from the cruel hurt of the coal.

Nelson, her oldest boy, who was now eleven, had been in the breaker for two years, and Laddie, her wee bairnie, must soon go, for the foreman had said to Hugh only the day before: "Send your kids into the breaker, Kirklin; we need 'em." For Hugh to refuse was to lose his job. There was no other way, Jean must go. She watched his little form toil up the hill and around the culm heaps toward the breaker; she saw the glad sunshine and the fields and woods joyous with singing birds; she heard the school bell ring in the distance and then her gaze fell on a group of men coming up the street carrying the poor, crooked body of Sandy Kalkara. Maidie had ever been strong-hearted and brave, but the bitterness of death seized her as she looked from Sandy to the tall breaker that had crushed out his life and thought that soon it would crush and blast the lives of her own boys as it had his. A sob that had in it the cry of anguish fell from her lips, then her failing faith reasserted itself and she raised her eyes to the sky beyond and whispered, "Oh, my God! Help, for none other can."

CHAPTER III.

Penny and the Inspector.

When the sun reaches the horizon and the hands of the clock on the town hall point to half past six, the earth around Minington pours forth streams of humanity. Thousands of men and boys come from her black depths, and like a dark procession wind wearily around the culm heaps and along the streets to their homes in the Black Acre. These are the men of toil; their backs have been bent all day at labor in the mines. There is not much joyousness and raillery among the men, and only now and then a momentary outburst of mirth among the boys, whose faces have the same weary, oldish look as those of the men that have worked for years in the mines.

A little apart from the others and hurrying along is Jean Kirklin. Week after week, month after month, he has sat on his bench all day, bending over constantly to look at the coal that passed below. His tender hands have become toughened by contact with the sharp pieces of slate and coal which cut and bruise them. He has breathed the air thick with coal dust until his face is of that peculiar grayish white common to children of the mines, but his own brown hair is abundant and wavy, and his dark eyes are peculiarly striking, with a pathetic look in them that lingers long in your memory when he raises them to your face.

For four years Jean has tumbled out of bed early in the morning, eaten a hasty breakfast, taken his dinner pail and gone to the mines.

In summer the hot sun has poured down on the roof just above, almost stifling him, and in the winter his hands have been stung and stiffened with the bitter cold. The breaker roars relentlessly, the stream of coal passes unceasingly, and Jean has become but a part of the terrible machine.

But as he hurries along he sees only a picture of home—he has seen it a thousand times as he sits watching the steady, black stream of coal—mother, tired and worn from her day's work; father, stooped and gray with the labor of the mines, and little Laddie on the bed. Always when Jean gets this far in his picture he pauses and swallows down "something" that comes up in his throat; "feels like my heart," he was once heard to say.

Laddie had been a breaker boy, too. He had gone to the breaker one morning three years ago with Jean, and had worked bravely day after day for nearly two years; but his slight frame would not stand the strain and he began to cough. One morning he could not get up, and when Dr. Jones was called, he shook his head and said, "Laddie must rest. Keep him out of that breaker."

Tonight Jean's face is animated and his eyes are lit up with a peculiar interest. At noon the breaker boss had sent him on an errand across the fields to another colliery. On the way back he found a bunch of violets which he dug carefully out of the ground and wrapped in some dry grass. This was the cause of his haste and evident pleasure; he was taking them to Lottie and imagining over and over how they would please her.

Lottie Rominski is a cripple. She went into the factory to work when only seven years old, and now at ten she can neither walk nor straighten her back. When the miners go home she is always at the window. Her little cot stands near so that she can pull herself up by the ledge, and her bright face and happy smile greet them as they pass.

When Jean turned the corner at Grace Church, he heard his name called and looking across the street, saw Evelyn, the little daughter of Rev. Robert Hathaway, pastor of Grace Church, running down to the gate and beckoning to him to cross the street. Older and more intelligent people than Jean had been charmed by the bright-faced and sunny-haired Evelyn. Her pink gingham dress and white apron danced in the breeze as she ran to meet him.

"Oh, Jean, will you take these to Lottie as you pass by? They are some cooky hearts I made after mamma got through baking today and here is an apple and a raisin cooky for Laddie. Be sure and remember which is which; and, oh Jean, come down after supper; Penny is coming and we will have our writing lesson."

Jean blushed under the coal dust and stammered out that he would take the cookies to Lottie and Laddie. Somehow he never liked to have Evelyn see him when he was black and dirty with the dust of the breaker, the contrast between her fresh loveliness and his grime was so great.

Jean stopped at Lottie's open window and her cheery "Hello, Jean!" brought a smile to his face. He gave her the cooky hearts and the little plant that he had carried so carefully. Lottie was overjoyed when she saw the blue violets, and told Jean they were the first she had seen this spring, and that she would plant them in a tin can and put them on the window where he could see them when he passed.

Jean had started on toward home when he saw Penny sitting on the gate post.

William Penn Crosset was a colored boy a little younger than Jean. He had always gone by the name of "Penny," and was a great favorite with the miners, especially the boys. His father was a barber and had a snug little income which kept his family quite independent.

"Hi there, Jean! What yer know?" and a handspring landed him on the other side of the walk in front of Jean.

"Oh, golly, Jean, yer ought to been to the fact'ry today and seen me git even wid ole stick-in-de-mud."

"Why, Penny!" said Jean, "who is stick-in-de-mud, now?"

"Can't be but one stick-in-de-mud an' dat's the ole boss. I mean the young boss what thinks he's so smart," said Penny. "I'se jes' goin' to walk along wid you, Jean, and told yer 'bout de fun.

"Well, yer know Tilly Obinski was sick today an' ax me to take her place at de loom. I takes her place, but dey pay me more'n seventeen cents a day, I tells yer. Well, dat fact'ry 'spector he comes round an' when de ole forewoman heared it she said, 'You kids skin away an' hide 'fore de 'spector gits down here.' Dey was a big pile of boxes close to de wall, jes' a little crack for us children to hide behind. De boxes went up high, an' me an' Katie an' a lot of other kids crep' in. I says to dem, 'Now when dat 'spector man an' de boss gits down here dar's goin' to be a mir'cle.'

"I hearn dem comin' an' talkin'. The boss says, 'No, we don't 'ploy children less'n fourteen years old.' Jes' then I jiggled the boxes an' over they went right on de ole boss.

"Oh, golly, Jean, yer ought to see how many colors his face got in a minute; it was black as mine an' as red as de comb on ole man Peterson's rooster. Katie an' de whole pack of kids was skeered to death. As soon as ole stick-in-de-mud could speak he said, 'Wat in de name of thunder are you kids doin' here? Go home to your mothers, where you 'long.'

"I said, 'Mister, de fo'woman tole us all to hide 'fore de 'spector man come 'round.' He made a grab at me, but I was on my way home."

Penny laughed and turned a double handspring.

Jean laughed heartily at Penny's story, and asked him if this factory inspector was not a new thing in the Minington factory, and Penny replied that he had never seen any before. Both of the boys knew what an inspector was. The mines had been inspected for many years, but not the factories.

When Jean arrived home one glance at his mother's face told him that Laddie was not as well, and his usual "Hello, Jean," was in a very weak voice. When he had washed the coal black from his face and hands and put on the clean jumper that hung behind the kitchen door, Jean sat down beside his brother. He rarely had any new experiences to relate, for all days were alike in the breaker, but tonight as he told Laddie about Penny and the factory inspector, Laddie's merry laugh brought his mother into the room. "Why, Jean," she said, "I have not heard the lad laugh like that for many a day."

"He ought to hear Penny tell it, mither, he would laugh harder than ever," said Jean.

The sweetest piece of news that Laddie ever had to tell was that Mrs. Hathaway had called. The brightest spots in his lonely life were the visits. Mrs. Hathaway was an angel of mercy to the many "shut-ins" in this mining and factory town. Her Bible stories, simply told, had pointed out a life of hope that would otherwise never have been theirs in this world. Today she had told Laddie how Jesus had found a little, lost sheep and carried it in his arms back to the fold, then, while gently smoothing the white forehead, repeated the twenty-third psalm, and sang softly "Land o' the Leal," till the tired eyes drooped and she slipped away.

Mrs. Hathaway had discovered the true worth of Maidie. She recognized her fine traits of character and true womanliness so different from most of the other women of this mining district, who were largely Irish and Slavs. Yet she saw her living neighbor to these in the truest sense, never holding herself above any one, but ever, in spite of her surroundings, practicing in her own life and striving to instil into her boys the refined and manly traits which so many mothers often fail to inculcate, or, indeed, to show that they possess.

Song of the Out of Doors.

Come with me, O you world-weary, to the haunts of thrush and veery,
To the cedar's dim cathedral and the palace of the pine;
Let the soul within you capture some of the wild-wood rapture,
Something of the epic passion of that harmony divine!
Down the pathway let us follow through the hemlocks to the hollow,
To the woven, vine-wound thickets in the twilight vague and old,
While the streamlet winding after is a trail of silver laughter,
And the boughs above hint softly of the melodies they hold.

Through the forest, never caring what the way our feet are faring,
We shall hear the wild bird's revel in the labyrinth of tune,
And on mossy carpets tarry in His temples, cool and airy,
Hung with silence and the splendid, amber tapestry of noon.
Leave the hard heart of the city with its poverty of pity,
Leave the folly and the fashion wearing out the faith of men,
Breathe the breath of life blown over upland meadows white with clover,
And with childhood's clearer vision see the face of God again!

The Woman Who Laughs.

People like her. Yes, they do, there's no getting away from it. The girl who laughs a ringing whole-souled laugh—no affected simper and no silly giggle—is a general favorite.

A plump, rosy-looking woman rode on one of the suburban trains the other day, with two men. She laughed continually, again and again. And the men with her laughed too. They were all in the best of spirits, though it was easy to see that the girl set the pace. Her merry comment and blithesome chatter and wholesome laugh kept the other two in a high good humor with themselves, with her, and with all the world.

They were not vulgar, nor boisterous. Don't understand that, please. Their conversation was refined, and their merriment perfectly within the limit of good breeding.

It was simply that the girl gave a merry turn to everything. Her companions were just naturally affected by her irresistible cheeriness. It was like sunshine. They laughed as spontaneously and happily as if they never had a business trouble or care in the world.

A woman of that disposition does a man good. She does anybody good, for that matter. To be sure, no one wants a perpetual and meaningless laughter as a companion. But there is no doubt that girl knows when to laugh, and when to show another, graver, tenderer side of her nature.

If it is a time for quietness and thought, even for tears, she could probably meet the occasion. It is the ordinary, commonplace routine of the day, whereover most of us make a wry face and a moan, that this girl transforms by the magic of her laughter.

Over most things that do not call for tears, we may as well laugh. But we forget. And we all, men and women, like the cheery, sunny, whole-souled woman who helps us to remember.—Bulletin.

From the time that the mother binds the child's head till the moment that some kind assistant wipes the death damp from the brow of the dying, we cannot exist without mutual help.

The Sunday-school Lesson.

A New King Sought*

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

It became apparent to Samuel, before many years of Saul's reign had passed, that he was not a suitable man to be king. Such a judgment could only be passed upon him, however, by one who had the highest ideals of leadership. In many ways Saul was an admirable man. Physically he was an ideal commander. He was brave, patriotic and devoted to the welfare of his people. History is full of figures of far less worthy kings than Saul. Yet to Samuel's mind he could not endure the test of affairs. And it is Samuel's view, or rather that of the prophetic order, which prevails in our narratives.

The Three Strands.

As has been previously pointed out in these studies, we have three different strands of narrative in our accounts of this period. One set of traditions, handed on from one generation to another, was devoted to the memory of Saul, and wherever it appears we get a favorable estimate of his career. But for the most part it is the admirers of Samuel and David from whose narratives our records are made up. These combine to give to David the sanction of Samuel's approval and influence, and of such accounts the one before us is an example. It is not without difficulties, which lie upon the surface too obvious not to attract attention. Yet its purpose is clear, to show that the Davidic throne had the sanction of the great prophet; and the perception of that purpose is our chief concern.

Difficulties.

Among the difficulties of the story are: the fact that Samuel, who holds the chief place in the narrative of this age, should have feared the wrath of Saul, or should have been concerned for his own safety, even though he thought himself in danger. Again, would it be consistent with the high and serious work of Samuel to evade suspicion by the pretense of a sacrifice, and if he were to give out this report, would he take with him the beast for the offering from his own home? But more difficult still is the explanation of the anointing of David. Was it a common thing to anoint youths in that age? If not, how is it that neither David's father, his brothers nor himself seemed at all conscious that anything of importance had been done? The other narratives show David's father later on treating him as any other boy might have been treated, which would have been unaccountable if he had known that he was to be king. Nor is the language of David's brothers to him possible of explanation on the supposition that they knew he was to be a ruler over them. Nor does David ever reveal the slightest conception of the honor that awaits him. These facts would be impossible to explain on the hypothesis of a continuous narrative by a single author. As it is, they occasion no difficulty whatever, for we recognize in them the various strands of tradition woven about a great character of the past.

Samuel's Sanction of David.

It was natural that the descendants and friends of David's dynasty should wish to connect with his ascent to the throne the approval of the prophet Samuel. In that fact is found the motive for this story, and those who repeated it were never called upon to reconcile it with the numberless other traditions which freely passed from one mouth to another regarding Israel's greatest king. Our greatest aid in understanding the Old Testament with its variations of narrative is the remembrance that it came from many different hands and groups, and that every tradition, whatever its source or basis in fact, was deemed valuable as the vehicle of religious truth by the prophets who employed it in their popular instruction.

The Sacrificial Feast.

The greatness of Samuel's fame is shown in the awe of the elders of Bethlehem at his approach. He had come from his home at Ramah, a few miles north of the later site of Jerusalem. His attitude, whether peaceful or hostile, was a matter of first moment to the men of the old town. He allayed their fears by saying that he had come to hold a feast, which corresponded in their time with a short revival. There was a sacrifice, at which some parts of the victims were burned upon the altar, and the rest used for the festival meal. Then there followed the preaching of the prophet, in order that the people might get a clearer idea of God's will regarding their lives. To such a sacrificial feast Samuel now summoned them.

The Children.

The scene that took place when the family of Jesse was inspected must not be regarded as unique in such a gathering. Samuel would not have placed Jesse's family, and especially David, in such peril as would have been involved if he had marked them out for his special regard. He treated all alike. He passed along the ranks of families and demanded if the children were all here. It was a family religion which he proclaimed. How long would an average preacher today have to wait to begin the service if he delayed matters till all the children arrived? And how many parents would think their children able to endure the hardship of the hour of public service in addition to the Sunday-school? It is to be feared that our customs are not as good in this regard as those which Samuel enjoined upon ancient Israel.

Which One?

The inspection of the sons of Jesse was the natural concern of the prophet. Reports concerning the youths had confirmed him in the belief that one of them would be a fitting choice for king. And Samuel regarded his enlightened conviction on all matters pertaining to the welfare of the kingdom as the will of God. One after the other they passed before him till seven had been scrutinized with the high honor in mind. Yet he was not satisfied. The youngest of all had to come from the sheep pasture before the seer was convinced that the right man was found. There had been one mistake already in the choice of king, and he had made it. It would not do to have another misadventure of that sort happen.

The Hidden Purpose.

If we follow the account as given, and accept the fact that Samuel anointed David, what did the transaction mean to those who looked on? Or was it a private scene, kept from the knowledge of the jealous Saul? Even so, what did David understand by it? Did he take it as an introduction into the school of the prophets, of which there was perhaps an organization at Bethlehem? Was it in such a school that he gained his knowledge of the past and something of his skill in music? We do not know, nor are we concerned to explain away the difficulties of the narrative. Our wish is much more in harmony with a true method of Bible study—to see what the writer really says, and what was his point of view. This is the only way to come to a true and reverent understanding of the Scriptures. And we may well be interested in the simple and beautiful manner in which David, the great king and psalmist is first introduced to us, as a youth summoned to complete a family circle at the altar of God.

The Prayer-Meeting.

God's Grace in Earthen Vessels.

Topic, August 5. 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 4:7.

SILAS JONES.

One of the most common errors is that of expecting perfection in those to whom the grace of God comes. Men may strenuously deny them; this assumptive underlies their reasoning when a careful analysis will reveal the presence of the assumption. The material element is eliminated and the result demanded is that which would appear if spirit alone were involved. Men are expected, upon invitation, to forsake lifelong habits and ever after to act as if those habits had never existed. Neural processes can not be changed in a moment, and even when bad habits are broken up the man cannot be what he might have been. The tendency is for us all to fall back into the habits of speech and conduct that we aequired in youth. Unless a miracle is wrought by the power of God, we must expect to be limited in our capacity to appropriate the riches of the spiritual realm by the wrong ways of thinking and acting which we aequired in early life and these habits of youth are in part an inheritance. We were born into a certain spiritual atmosphere and with tendencies conditioned by our ancestry. It is unreasonable to ask that God's grace shall obliterate the past. We do not expect the color of our skin to be changed. We expect the white man to remain white and the negro to remain black. The sooner we cease to look for results in the moral life for which there is no basis in fact, the sooner will possible improvement be seen.

The possibilities of the human spirit are vaster than we have ever conceived them. That we are compelled to give up unfounded assumptions is no warrant for leaving undeveloped what is given to us. The divine grace enables us to bring to its highest efficiency every power of the soul. Our growth in spirit is in accordance with law. The coming of God's grace into a life does not create confusion; it brings order and harmony. Disorder comes from sin, sin is disorder. It is a break with the moral order of the universe. When God is allowed to enter the heart, the man begins to widen his environment and to have an increasing number of spiritual interests. To judge him justly and to have a reasonable view of God's grace in his life, we must qnow what he had at the start, what is the material that is to be fashinode; when all the elements entering a life are fully considered, stupid criticism and advice that has no sense in it will be repressed. The dignity of human character will be discerned and gratitude will arise to God for his goodness and his loving kindness to the children of men.

Paul was haunted by the memory of the grievous injury he had inflicted upon the early church. This early sin seems to have been felt by him as a serious limitation. The important matter for us now is that he did not allow it to be a a more serious limitation that it of necessity was. He might have brooded over it until his will was paralyzed. He did no such thing. As soon as he saw that he was wrong in his judgment of the church, he began at once to build up what he had tried to destroy. Sorrow over sin is praiseworthy only as it leads to the forsaking of sin and the seeking of goodness. Paul could not shut out his former life from his mind once; when he thought of it, sorrow filled his heart. But his habit was to think of the work he had in hand. There was always something just ahead which fascinated him and drew him on. Men do not need to strive after a sense of sin. If they have high ideals and strive to reach them, the sense of sin will come uninvited.

Christian Endeavor Lesson.

For the Church.

Christian Endeavor Topic for August 2.

In the church, each of us has his own service to perform. First of all, we must each one live the Christian life. If we do not do that, no other service that we seek to render can be worth much. And that each of us can do for Jesus' sake.

Then we can serve the church in many ways besides.

1. We can attend its services promptly and take part heartily in its worship, joining in all prayers and singing heartily as unto the Lord.

2. We can invite others to the services of the church, calling for them, if need be, and taking them to our own pew.

3. We can seek to win others to Christ by talking with them about him, by giving them books to read, by introducing them to the pastor.

4. We can be faithful in the Sunday-school, teaching when the opportunity comes, and bringing others to share in its privileges.

5. We can refuse to criticize the church, or the pastor, or our fellow Christians, or to repeat any gossip. "This church has one good characteristic," said a man of the church of which he was a member. "It is loyal. If it didn't like the pastor and two of its members were in an open field at midnight, they wouldn't whisper it to each other."

6. We can help to keep the church building neat and attractive. We can see that it is tastefully decorated with the flowers which the Savior loved, and we can keep it clean and beautiful.

7. We can give according as God hath prospered us, systematically and proportionately.

8. We can pray for the church, for its officers and its work, for missionaries at home and abroad, and for the unity of all who love Christ.

9. We can defend the church when it is attacked and refuse to take part in all slighting talk about it.

10. And, lastly, we can be hopeful. There is every ground for hope. Those who talk of the future of the church, of its losing ground over the world, do not know the facts. We can speak courageously, and in accord with the truth. What God has established will not be overthrown. The church is to be made better and stronger. We are to do it, and we are to be hopeful about it.—S.S. Times.

Tired.

The day is long, and the day is hard,
We are tired of the march and of keeping guard;
Tired of the sense of a fight to be won,
Of days to live through and of work to be done;
Tired of ourselves and of being alone,
Yet all the while, did we only see,
We walk in the Lord's own company,
We fight, but 'tis he who nerves our arm;
He turns the arrows that else might harm,
And out of the storm he brings a calm;
And the work that we count so hard to do,
He makes it easy, for he works too;
And the days that seem long to live are his,
A bit of his bright eternities;
And close to our need his helping is.

The Canary that was Cross.

Phyllis had a wonderful canary. It was a yellow canary, but that was not what made it wonderful. It was like some children in that the most wonderful thing about it was its temper. It was a wonder for getting cross, and if its water was not all right, and if its seed was not just so, it moved its foolish head quickly and behaved ridiculously. "Tantrums" is, I think, the only word that rightly described its behavior.

One day Phyllis closed the door of its cage and forgot to fasten it. It was rather unfortunate that just then pussy was paying a morning call elsewhere, for as soon as Phyllis had left the room the canary butted against the door of the cage and forced it open. Next it flew around a little in descending circles, and at last it perched on the sideboard. At the back of the sideboard was a mirror; and to his amazement the canary saw what he thought was another canary staring him straight in the face. This amazed him, and he looked away for a minute. When he looked back again, there, of course, he saw his image gazing at him again.

He blinked hard, and then he spoke. "Foolish and obstreperous birdling," he said, "do not stare like that! You are so ugly and so yellow that you make me quite bilious. Avaunt, vile bird! Also shoo! Get away!"

The canary looked hard and shifted one leg, and to his utter disgust the bird in the glass, instead of moving away, simply imitated him. "That," he screamed out loud, "is impudence! You are no bird! You are not even a painted sparrow! You are just rudeness with some stolen feathers glued on all round! Pah and poor! And fly away!"

He stopped speaking; and in the hope the other bird would answer him, he began to think hard of nasty things he could say when he himself spoke next. But the bird in the glass said nothing, and so the canary got very angry indeed. "Speak," he commanded, swelling himself out, "or upon my word I shall become quite cross. Don't move your head just the same way as I do. If you don't go away I'll come to you and peck you into little pieces. Stop imitating me."

But the bird in the glass did not stop, and the real bird got so furiously angry that he did not even notice that Phyllis had come into the room and was watching. She stared hard to see him run back a little and then rush forward and peck at his own image as hard as he could. "There," he said, in a language Phyllis did not understand, "take that, and that! And there is another for always trying to peck back the same way as I do! Oh, I am so angry!" And his round eyes flamed, and he danced and pecked, and was altogether a sorry sight.

At last he gave one hard lunge crash against the glass, and his beak began to bleed. This increased his fury, and he pecked harder than ever, and just before Phyllis put out her hand to take him up he fell down, quite exhausted, looking sideways at his image in the mirror, and muttering and seeming crosser than ever.

Phyllis took him up tenderly, and, oh, how he throbbed in her hands, and how his heart did beat! She kissed him, dirty mouth and all, and then washed him all over in lukewarm water and talked to him gently. And the last thing she said to him was this:

"Why, Dicky, didn't you know that when children and birds are angry and behave spitefully to other people they always make a mistake; and what is more, if they only knew, all spitefulness really hurts them more than it hurts the people with whom they are angry. There, you foolish old birdie! Go back into your cage, and let us try and be good together."—Christian World.

A good building has been purchased from the Presbyterians, in which they were conducting a thriving Sunday-school.

THE ILLINOIS CONVENTION.

The time for the Illinois State Convention is rapidly approaching. The churches of Chicago regard the occasion as one of special blessing and opportunity for them. They do not often have the pleasure of welcoming the Disciples from other parts of the state. The churches in this city are not strong in comparison with those of several large places in the state. And their distance from one another makes close coöperation difficult. It is for this very reason that the occasion is one of value to them all.

One of the difficulties with which the committees intrusted from the first with the arrangement for the convention have had to contend is the date of the gathering. It comes just at the time when many people in the city are away on their vacations. But in spite of this fact, there has been a general and generous response to the call for workers in preparation for and entertainment of the convention, and all the churches are looking forward to an event of rare interest in the history of our work in Chicago.

DROPPED COFFEE.

Doctor Gains Twenty Pounds on Postum.

A physician of Washington, D. C., says of his coffee experience:

"For years I suffered with periodical headaches which grew more frequent until they became almost constant. So severe were they that sometimes I was almost frantic. I was sallow, constipated, irritable, sleepless; my memory was poor, I trembled and my thoughts were often confused.

"My wife, in her wisdom, believed coffee was responsible for these ills and urged me to drop it. I tried many times to do so but was its slave.

"Finally wife bought a package of Postum and persuaded me to try it, but she made it same as ordinary coffee and I was disgusted with the taste. (I make this emphatic because I fear many others have had the same experience.) She was distressed at her failure and we carefully read the directions, made it right, boiled it full fifteen minutes after boiling commenced, and with good cream and sugar. I liked it—it invigorated and seemed to nourish me.

"That was about a year ago. Now I have no headaches, am not sallow, sleeplessness and irritability are gone, my brain clear and my hand steady. I have gained twenty pounds and feel I am a new man.

"I do not hesitate to give Postum due credit. Of course dropping coffee was the main thing, but I had dropped it before, using chocolate, cocoa and other things to no purpose.

"Postum not only seemed to act as an invigorant, but as an article of nourishment, giving me the needed phosphates and albugiving me the needed phosphates and albumens. This is no imaginary tale. It can be substantiated by my wife and her sister, who both changed to Postum and are hearty women of about 70.

"I write this for the information and encouragement of others, and with a feeling of gratitude to the inventor of Postum."

We shall at least have no great competing attraction, as at the time of the National Convention in the year of the world's fair. Then the convention was lost sight of in the magnitude of the greater gathering. Chicago has always enough going on to attract the merely casual visitor away from the important things to which his attention might well be given. But the members of the churches from over the state who come to the convention will know the purpose for which they come, and will make the convention their first concern.

It is the earnest hope of all who have the convention on their hearts in this city that the number of those who come may be as large as possible. The welcome extended by the Disciples of Chicago is generous and warm. Make your plans to come and help make the best convention in the history of the Illinois state work.

COTNER UNIVERSITY GROWING.

It is apparent to all who visit Bethany (Lincoln) Nebraska, that Cotner University is one of our most promising schools. She has already accomplished a great work for our ministry and Christian education generally. The year that closed in June registered a great advance in her work. She had an attendance of nearly four hundred. The spirit of Christian loyalty and missionary enthusiasm has grown with increasing numbers. Sixty devoted and earnest young people were preparing either for the ministry or special missionary work. Practically all who entered during the year became Christians if they were not such when they entered. The earnest Christian spirit and constructive Bible teaching in the school brings this result from year to year. Honor has been conferred upon our school by the accrediting of our academy by the State Department of Education and by the recognition of our Department of Education by the same authority, granting grade and life certificates to the graduates of this department.

The work in Sacred Literature, because of its thoroughness, is attracting in rapidly increasing numbers those who are preparing for the ministry and missionary work.

Thoroughness marks the work to a degree that gives graduates advanced standing in post graduate courses in eastern institutions. Some of this year's class go east this fall. Our people are growing in their devotion to the works of the school and are ready to respond to the centennial call of Cotner for "$100,000 endowment and five hundred students by 1909."

AN OPEN DOOR.

Just one month ago we opened up a new station among a Mountain tribe, whose chief characteristic is gross ignorance. Two native evangelists were sent to begin the work. Last week one of them returned, giving the first report of their labors. At first both evangelists located in the same town. In a short time a school was opened with an enrolment of thirty-seven. The news spread. The leaders from another town visited the workers and urged them to open another school. The request was granted, and now we have the second school with an enrolment of twenty-five. In the latter town a building suitable for dwelling and school purposes has been provided by the inhabitants without price. They are anxious to have the gospel preached unto them. Now we are being urged to open other schools in this same region. We have the men, but not the means. While the Church of Christ is demonstrating her ability to carry on an aggressive Sunday School campaign at home, will she not lift up her eyes and look on this great field where hundreds of young people may be brought to a knowledge of Christ? Help us to give to these young men and women the bread of life.

Vigan, P. I. John Lord.

EVANGELISTIC.

Grand Junction, Col.—One confession and one addition by statement July 5. J. H. McCartney, pastor.

Salt Lake City, Utah.—Three additions today, July 12. Two baptisms at prayer meeting. Albert Buxton pastor.

Wichita, Kan.—There were six additions to the Central last Sunday. During the past six months there have been fifty-eight additions at the regular services. Since Nov. 1 there have been but three weeks without additions, a total of eighty-five. We have given $828 to missions during the past six months. Brother Guy B. Williamson of Chattanooga Tenn., comes to us as assistant pastor Aug. 1, just a month prior to the commencement of our Scoville meeting.

BETTER THAN GOLD.

Food That Rebuilds Body and Brain.

"I owe a debt of gratitude to Grape-Nuts," writes a W. Va. young lady, "and I am glad of this opportunity to pay a little interest on it, although the debt itself I can never hope to remove.

"A few years ago I broke down from overwork and improper food. I was then in a preparatory school and my fondest wish was to enter college the following year.

"But about the middle of the term my health failed, and my brain refused to grapple with the subjects presented to it. Finally, my eyesight giving way, I was taken from the school, and sent to my grandmother's in the country with orders not to open a book while I was there.

"The dear old lady tried every way to console and nurse me back to health, but it looked like failure until the day she brought back from town a box, which, had its contents been pure gold, would have been of less value to me than the little golden-brown granules which it actually contained.

"I did not care about being experimented on at first, but that was before I had tasted Grape-Nuts with Grandma's rich Jersey cream.

"Oh, it was too good to stop eating. And I never have stopped, for I still have Grape-Nuts for breakfast.

"In the course of a few weeks I was back at school again, my health so entirely restored that I was almost a new girl.

"I am now in my junior year at college, president of my class and expect to take an A. M. degree next year. My good health has continued and my eyes, having been strengthened by the general build-up of my whole body, enable me to study all I wish." "There's a Reason."

DR. R. H. CROSSFIELD.

Elected President of Transylvania University.

On June 30th, at a special meeting of the Board of Curators of Transylvania University, the recommendation of the committee previously appointed to select a president was adopted and Dr. Richard Henry Crossfield, of Owensboro, Kentucky, was unanimously chosen head of the institution.

Dr. Crossfield is an alumnus of Kentucky University, from which he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1889. After a while spent in teaching, he entered the Graduate School of Chicago University, from which he received the degree of Master of Arts in 1891. Coming back to Kentucky for work in the College of the Bible, the next year he was granted the Classical Diploma of that institution. Since then, as the result of graduate study, he has earned the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

For four years he was minister of the Christian Church in Glasgow, Kentucky. In 1896 he took charge of the church at Owensboro, which under his ministry has grown to be one of the strongest in the Brotherhood.

His selection has met with most hearty approval among the students and alumni, and the University is being congratulated in having secured as its head a man so thoroughly fitted for the varied duties of a university president. Dr. Crossfield is known throughout the State, and in many other States, as an untiring worker, as a man unusually gifted in force of character and executive ability. He is a man of scholarly training, lofty purpose, and high ideals, who possesses at the same time the saving grace of practical common sense.

Dr. Crossfield will not be able to leave his work in Owensboro before the first of November and will not be formally installed until that time. He is already carefully studying the needs and workings of the institution and putting himself in touch with students and alumni. He has taken hold of the work with his characteristic vigor, enthusiasm, and optimism. Friends of the University feel that there is strongest grounds for hope that the institution under his regime and under its new name is entering upon an epoch of great progress and wider usefulness and that its future is brighter than ever before.

A YEAR'S WORK IN FORT WAYNE.

The work at the Third Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., was begun by the earnest efforts of Bro. E. W. Allen. A lot 50x150 feet was purchased and a rough board tabernacle was built. Later an excavation 48x50 feet was made and cement walls built. Had Brother Allen remained he would have been able to have carried his good work on to completion. But after his departure the work was without any one regularly for nearly two years, when the State evangelist, Brother T. J. Legg, was called to hold a meeting. The good work of Brother Legg resulted in an organization of 68 members on the first of April, 1907. Upon his advise the church called Brother H. E. Stafford of the Third Church, New Castle, Pa. Brother Stafford took charge July 14, 1907. He found 59 active members, a Bible school of 40 regular attendants, an active Ladies' society, a hole on the back end of the lot, a rough board building on the front, and a mortgage of $1,000 on the property. His first plan was to pay off the mortgage by starting to build. It worked well. The mortgage was burned, the building erected and dedicated by Jan. 19, 1908. J. T. Sweeney dedicated. He asked for $1,000 and received $1,600. During the year a splendid financial system has been introduced; every missionary offering observed; a C. W. B. M. has been organized; the church membership has been increased to 80 active; the B. S. to 140 regulars—having for organized study, in which many young ladies and men have been interested, a Bible training class; a class in the study of missions, by Mrs. Stafford; about $2,800 raised in cash, and $1,000 in pledges. A meeting was held by Brother Stafford at Metz, Ind., and the church at Monroeville received his services every Lord's day afternoon, resulting in many additions. The church recalled him for another year—not a dissenting vote.

On the proper sealing of your jellies and preserves depends their "keeping." Metal and glass caps too often leak; tying with paper is next to useless; old lids are often insecure.

DR. DYE IN SEATTLE.

The city of Seattle entertained Dr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye for one week, beginning June 21 and closing with a farewell reception on Monday evening, June 29. Mrs. Louise Kelley, the national representative of the C. W. B. M. was a guest of honor at the reception.

Our churches have been stirred to their depths and not only has the First Church raised $950 for Dr. Dye's support, but the Queen Anne Church, J. L. Greenwell, pastor, raised $750 at the morning service Sunday, and has become a Living-Link.

Elaborate plans were made and carried out to the letter for the entertainment of our African representatives.

Too much commendation cannot be uttered in behalf of these consecrated missionaries. Their lives, their message, their humility and their ceaseless enthusiasm quicken and awaken all with whom they come in contact.

Every day brought new features to the front.

Sunday morning, June 21 Mrs. Dye spoke at the First Church, and won the appreciation of all her hearers. Tuesday and Wednesday Dr. Dye met the business Christian men of the city during the lunch hour at the Y. M. C. A. building. Plans were discussed for the enlargement of the Bolengi work, and those hours will ever be remembered. Strong men wept under the impassioned appeal of the speaker.

Wednesday evening witnessed the greatest social event the churches of Seattle ever witnessed. A banquet was tendered Dr. and Mrs. Dye, at which representatives from all the churches of the city were present. One hundred and twenty-five covers were laid. The spirit of fellowship and co-operation rose to high tide. Following the banquet at 8 p. m., in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. Building, Dr. Dye delivered his stereopticon lecture on "The Cry from the Heart of Africa," to an enthusiastic audience.

Thursday morning the W. F. G. girls of the First Church entertained the missionaries at a picnic. These young girls, about twenty-five in number, have pledged $25 a year to Dr. Dye's support.

Dr. and Mrs. Dye and Herman P. Williams, missionary to the Philippines, who returned on the steamer Aki Maru, June 25, were the center of attraction at the Sunday school picnic at Woodland Park, Friday.

The week culminated in a spiritual awakening in all the churches on Sunday. Dr. Dye spoke at the First Church, Mrs. Dye at the Queen Anne Church, and Mrs. Kelley at the University Church in the morning.

At 3 p. m. there was a mass meeting of the churches under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. women at the First Church. Mrs. J. C. McGinness, president of the Western Washington C. W. B. M., presided. Mrs. Kelley gave the formal address. Brother and Sister Dye spoke also.

In the evening Dr. Dye gave a farewell address at the First Church and Mrs. Kelley spoke at the Fremont Church.

The results are far reaching. All the churches have taken on new life. They are moving forward under a larger vision. The Northwest will be permanently benefitted by the visit of these powerful God-guided servants.

Mission study classes will be organized this winter and all along the line definite steps for consistent progress will be taken. We, one and all, pray the richest blessings

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI'S LAST POEM.

Heaven overarches earth and sea,
  Earth-sadness and sea-bitterness.
Heaven overarches you and me;
A little while and we shall be—
Please God—where there is no more sea,
  No barren wilderness.

Heaven overarches you and me,
  And all earth's gardens and her graves.
Look up with me, until we see
The day break and the shadows flee;
What though tonight wrecks you and me
  If so tomorrow saves?

JUDGE CHARLES J. SCOFIELD

Altar Stairs

By JUDGE, CHARLES J. SCOFIELD, Author of A Subtle Adversary. Square 12mo., cloth. Beautifully designed cover, back and side title stamped in gold. Illustrated, $1.20.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

The story will not only entertain all readers, but will also impart many valuable moral lessons. This is an age of story reading and the attention of the young especially, should be called to such books of fiction as "Altar Stairs."

W. G. WALTERS, Bluefield, W. Va.

If one begins this story, he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished.

CHRISTIAN OBSERVER, Louisville, Ky.

It is a strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement.

RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE, Dayton, Ohio.

A stirring religious novel. It abounds with dramatic situations, and holds the reader's interest throughout.

RAM'S HORN, Chicago, Ill.

It strikes the right key and there is not a single false note in the book.

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith

By HERBERT L. WILLETT, Author of The Ruling Quality, etc. Post 8vo. cloth. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top. Illustrated, 75 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. Its fascination holds the reader's attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished. Read what the reviewers say.

More of such books are needed just now among those who are pleading the restoration of Apostolic Christianity.

JAMES C. CREEL, Plattsburg, Mo.

It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of the truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher.

J. E. CHASE.

It is a good book and every Christian ought to read it.

L. V. BARBREE, Terre Haute, Ind.

his volume presents a comprehensive view of the subjects, though the author disclaims completeness.

Professor Willett's work is a new study of the old truths. The author's style is becoming more and more finished; his vocabulary is wonderful, and his earnestness is stamped on every page.

Church Organization.

In view of the vast amount of time and attention which the church in various ages and lands has bestowed upon organization, it is a cause of surprise that Jesus and the apostles concerned themselves so little with the subject. The Master had no scheme of church formation. Indeed he referred to the church but once in all his teachings (Matt. 16:18), and even then he appeared to be thinking less of the visible organism than of the complex of redeemed souls and redemptive forces which he usually designated as the Kingdom of God. On the only other occasion when he employed the word, he meant by it the Jewish Synagogue (Matt. 18:17).

The apostles on the other hand, made constant use of the term. Their concern was with the actual community of believers. In their day and through their labors the Kingdom had given visible manifestation of its presence in the rapid growth of the church. The Master's teaching concerned itself with the principles and ideals of the new life he was revealing to the world. The apostles devoted themselves to the interpretation and diffusion of that life throughout the Roman Empire. It was their task to convince the Jew that the program of Jesus realized all his Messianic hopes, and to persuade the Gentile that his dreams of a golden age could only find embodiment in the new Christian social order.

Then the two men, Jew and Gentile, who had been hostile hitherto, had to be taught the fine art of living together in love, not under the Mosaic law, as the former would have insisted, nor according to the unsocial institutes of paganism, as the latter might have suggested, but under the new law of the spirit of life as presented in the teachings of Jesus and given embodiment in his life.

The believers thus won to the new point of view gathered under apostolic leadership into groups of Christians called churches. Yet for these groups Jesus had planned no formal organization, nor did the apostles devise one. Their concern was not with the form and mechanism of these companies of disciples, called out of the world into the new relation, but rather with their personal and collective adjustment to the will of the Lord. As the need of organization was felt, the churches appear to have adopted the form of association made familiar to them by local custom and habit.

In Jewish communities the synagogue was the recognized unit of organized life. Its plan was simple. The congregation drawn together for purposes of instruction and worship, chose as leaders or supervisors a small group of men, usually ten, called presbyters or elders. To these men, approved by age and wisdom, was committed the direction of affairs. Local needs suggested various additional ministeries, but the essentials of the synagogue organization were simple and uniform. This became the model for Christian congregations, and "elders" and "deacons," both familiar words in the Jewish vocabulary, became the common term by which the leaders were designated.

In other regions beyond the active and molding influence of Judaism the Christian communities took the forms suggested by the common practices of Greek or Latin social and industrial life and the leaders were called "bishops" or "pastors" as social custom, usually secular in character, suggested. The church had no thesis to maintain on this subject of organization, and accepted freely the forms which had been built up by custom and were best suited to its ministries as the bearer of Jesus' life to the world.

As time went on and the churches multiplied, the tendency to diversity of form and organization increased. It was, however, held in check by the centralizing forces of the bishops of Rome, who gradually gathered to themselves the control of the entire institution in virtue of the immense advantage given them by the political centrality and authority of the imperial city.

With the rise and growth of protestantism came a reaction from this central power, and this reaction carried far. Liberty in doctrine was accompanied by the eager acceptance of freedom in organization. The result was that the same tendency which sent the framers of doctrine to the New Testament for the materials of their evangels also sent the framers of organizations to the same source to ascertain the divine plan of constructing and relating congregations. It is a significant fact that each of the different and widely contrasted systems of church organization and government insists that its model is found in the New Testament, either in explicit description and practice, or by implication, suggestion or tendency. This is true of systems as widely differing from each other as the strongly centralized church of Rome and the loosely related bodies which adopt the congregational form of relationship.

Nor is it doubtful that all these methods of organization have proved valuable at various times in the history of the church. Even the most determined and persistent opponent of Romanism will concede that for the conditions of the middle ages the ideals of church organization as they were conceived and partially realized by such popes as the first Leos and Gregories were all that saved Europe from chaos. That they have proved ineffective in other years and are fighting a life and death battle with present conditions is the result of the failure of human nature when entrusted with great power, and also the fact that political and social ideas and institutions have changed totally since that time.

The relation of these facts to the problem of organization among the Disciples of Christ will be considered next week.

The Abiding Love.

Is there a future life? Yes. Because love never dies. Gifts such as prophecies and tongues, possessions such as principalities and powers pass away, but love abides. It stills the cry of pain, soothes the brow of care, brushes away the stain of sin, paints the world with colors of hope, and leads the way to the mansions of the blessed. I notice the animal forgets its offspring when it is large enough to care for itself or when it is dead; but absence or death only increases man's love. Deep down in the heart of the father and mother is the image of the little one—that boy or girl who years ago passed into the unseen. With loving hands we hang upon the wall the pictures of those who have entered upon higher and eternal service. Gone! Yes, gone! but we love them more intensely. In our hearts there is a deep-seated longing to see something of them all through eternity. And of Christ, we love him more and more, and we shall never be satisfied until we see him face to face. Shall love's longing ever be satisfied?

"He hath not learned life's lessons well
Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to sight and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death
And love can never lose its own."

—Selected.

The Hopeful View.

There is a great difference in the way different people endure their sorrow. Some look only down—down into the grave, down into their own breaking hearts, down at the emptiness, the ruin, and the darkness about them. These find no comfort. Others, with grief no less keen, with loss no less sore, look up into the face of God and see love there; look into heaven where their loved ones are; look at the blessed stars of hope which shine above them, and are comforted. Whittier, in "Snow-Bound" sets the two aspects of sorrow side by side:

"Alas for the man who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!

"Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever Lord of death,
And love can never lose its own?"

The Spirit of Current Religious Journalism

Will F. Shaw.

This is a day of moral reform. The general note of religious journalism is clear on local option agitation and banishment of saloons. Perhaps our religious neighbors are leading in this work. The Northwestern Advocate is preëminently proper in its present presentation of columns to the vital issues in this year's fight against the saloon. I would not for one moment detract from the teacher-training campaign, but would give at least equal space and emphasis to the community-training campaign. The spirit of Lincoln and Philips and Lovejoy and Haddock and Frances Willard is abroad in our land in too great evidence to be simply mentioned; while the spirit of nullification will not be ignored. The attitude of our religious papers should be such that every convention of our brotherhood would be provoked to the consideration of Christian citizenship, and the expression of every convention should be such that our papers must breathe the spirit of an aroused conscience demanding liberty and protection for infants, orphans and starved, outraged motherhood at the hands of the most damning traffic ever condoned by an erring government. Let us answer the pen of southern writers with columns of support and cheer; let us grip the hand of the sunny South with the Spirit of our God in the public acclamation of every assembly and the proclamation of every press. Here as never before, "Where the Scriptures speak let us speak." This is a time for Scriptural education. From Genesis to Revelation print God's Word on strong drink, its woes, its warnings, that with profit it may be read as never before. Only a few rum-soaked cities like Chicago will present a sense-drugged audience large enough to warrant hall-rent to hear pretentious claims to Scriptural authority for rum and its riot in this day of grace. Let current thinkers grasp the trend of the hour and Isaiah 28 will be fulfilled: "In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people; and for a spirit of justice to him that sitteth in judgment, and for strength to them that turn back the battle to the gate, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment. For all the tables are full of vomit and filthiness—judgment also will I lay to the line and righteousness to the plummet: and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place. And your covenant with death shall be annulled and your agreement with hell shall not stand...."

The spirit of untiy here and there ventured should fill the religious press. Presbyterian unification in Japan and America, Methodist oneness in Canada, Baptist and Disciple affiliation in Canada and Illinois leave scant room for the press of these brotherhoods to glory in a divisive history or a sectarian existence. With hope our souls glow at the thrilling Christ spirited address and approach of Dr. Dodds—with apprehension and misgiving our eyes search the columns of the Chicago Baptist Standard for the passing of that message and the splendid message of our own beloved Burnham to their people. Is the press open to the answer of our Savior's prayer that they all may be one, or to religious courtship must there come Maud Muller's lament: "It might have been"? Or that other equally portentous presence, so aptly voiced by Dr. Dubois: "The spirit of denominational self-consciousness was in evidence"—set over against the prayer of our Savior, "That they all may be one." The inter-relation of the membership of Christ's Body is too intricate—too inseparably intricate—to permit the parading of individual or separative self-consciousness. His gallant heart beats right who expressed his yearning for a journalism representative of every religious interest of humanity. Let the light of that spirit shed its beams to the point where the sea-sick, strife-beaten waters of the rougher inland sectarian Michigans find their converging currents becoming placid in the common harbor of God's Word and His Love. No room for the boasting of Lake Michigan in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; no room for the vaunting of denominationalism in the bosom and spirit of our common Christ. But let religious journalism find God's channel—as does St. Lawrence, to its destination—God's way, no room for supererogation; no room for self-complacency; no room for self-exultation, no room for joy in any people save where their hearts and lives have touched the common thought and purposes of the Son of God. "Until we all come in the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God to the perfect man—to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," rather than boast, let us pray.

IN THE TOILS OF FREEDOM

BY ELLA N. WOOD

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER IV.
The Coal Shadow.

Prosperity had not marked the path of the Kirklins since coming to Minington. The indebtedness to the company that Hugh had incurred during his sickness, had taken several years to repay, and the great strike that swept through Anthracite and lasted for months, almost brought starvation to the doors of hundreds of miners.

This time had passed and Jean and his father were again at the mines. The scanty food during the strike had been hard on Laddie, and he had failed daily, and his white face and great wistful eyes on the little cot caused old Doctor Jones' blood to boil every time he saw them, so that he sometimes gave vent to his feelings and astonished Maidie by saying, "They have no right to force these little fellows into the breaker before they are half grown. It would kill an ox to bend over the coal run twelve hours a day, half the time cold enough to chill the very blood, and the other half stifled with the heat. They might about as well run them through the breaking rolls at first and have it over with." Then, with an abruptness that characterized Doctor Jones, he turned to Maidie and said, "Jean will be where this one is in a little while if you don't take him away from the breaker."

Maidie looked at the doctor in mute despair. Jean, her Jean, the only support of their old age, to go like Laddie! for the heart-breaking truth had been pressing home to her in the last few weeks, that she must part from Laddie.

Two years before, they had brought Nelson home to her on a stretcher. He died that night, and was laid with the many other children in the cemetery on the hill, murdered by the mines. He had been a door boy, sitting in the dark silence of the mine day after day, only rising from the rude bench he had made to open the door when he heard a car coming. One day Garry McFee, who was a driver, had asked him to help Joe fire a blast. The insufficiently propped roof gave way, and a slab of slate fell on Nelson. Joe tried to remove it, but finding that he could not, ran for help. When Nelson was taken out, it took only a glance to see that he would never go to the mines again.

Jean was summoned and walked home beside the stretcher with the first bitter and resentful feeling in his heart that he had ever known. It took no definite shape, but stirred him to his very soul. When he grew older he knew what this feeling was that came over him then and stayed by him day by day, as he worked in the breaker.

By Nelson's death one means of family revenue was cut off, it was only a little, amounting to about $1.70 a week, but it meant much to the miner's family.

After Hugh's accident, Maidie had felt that she must help pay the debt, so she had gone to work in the textile factory and labored early and late, getting up at four o'clock in the morning, cooking the breakfast and preparing the lunches, then off to the factory, where she worked till the whistles blew in the evening, when she hurried home to get the evening meal, and then to work at the necessary household duties.

They found trading at the company's store was terribly expensive. The prices paid for staples were much higher than the same goods could be had for at other stores. Besides, Hugh had to pay the exorbitant price of $3 a keg for all the powder he used. He had been kept on a thin vein of coal, and that necessitated more blasting and thus a greater quantity of powder. It also caused more dockage because there were more impurities in the coal. Frequently he received no money from the company, but he drew what is known as a "bob-tail" check. This is a slip of paper stating that not much is coming to the miner.

To make their condition still worse, the accident had lamed him, and he would never again be able to work rapidly, which still further reduced his earnings. Yet he bravely labored on day after day for those he loved, determined to do all he could to give them the necessities of life, even if its pleasures were all denied them.

CHAPTER V.

Jean's First Awakening.

Mr. Forsythe, the newly appointed factory inspector of Pennsylvania, of whom Penny had spoken in his conversation with Jean, was an old college friend of Mr. Hathaway. He had taken tea with the Hathaways that evening, and after supper they had sat on the porch talking over old times, and telling their experiences since commencement day at old Princeton, when they had clasped hands and said good-bye, each to go his own road in life. While they were sitting there, Doctor Jones came up the walk and joined them. He and Mr. Hathaway had one common interest at heart, that of the injustice done to the children of the laboring classes in that great commercial state which has engraved on her seal "Virtue, Liberty, and Independence."

They had been trying for several years to secure the enactment of better laws governing child labor. Mr. Hathaway introduced his friend to the doctor as the new factory inspector that had recently been appointed in Pennsylvania, and their talk soon drifted into the subject of the textile mills and their rapid growth in the mining districts.

"What attraction has your little daughter out there, Hathaway?" asked Mr. Forsythe, looking at Evelyn, who was on the lawn surrounded by four or five poorly-clad children.

"Oh, Evelyn is proving to be quite a philanthropist. Scarcely an evening passes that she does not have some of the mill children and breaker boys up here trying to teach them to read and write. She is very much distressed over the fact that there are so many children in our town that work every day and have no educational advantages," replied Mr. Hathaway.

"Why do you not have a night school that these children can attend for an hour or two in the evening?"

"We tried the night school plan for a while, but it was an entire failure. The working children are as a rule so tired with the toil of the day that they simply go to sleep over their books. The long hours of work leave the children apathetic, and when night comes the only thing they can do is to tumble into their beds and there sleep the sleep of utter exhaustion till the whistle calls them to another day's work."

"I suppose you have already noticed the demand for child labor, Mr. Forsythe. You will meet it in every manufacturing and mining town, not only in our own state but others. There is a perfect exodus of northern mills into the South. The prime reason for this is that they can secure cheap labor, and a large percentage of their employes are the children of the poor whites, who go into the mills without an atom of education and grow up in utter ignorance," said Doctor Jones.

"Do you think it is as bad as that, Doctor?" asked Mr. Forsythe.

"Yes, I do, and as much worse as can be imagined. Why, right here in Minington there are hundreds of children working every day that can neither read nor write, and a large percentage of them are under age children. The law says that a boy must be twelve years old before he can work in the breaker, but at least one-third of the breaker boys are younger than that. Some of them are no more than eight years old; it is the same with the little girls who work in the mills."

"I didn't see any children in the mill today that appeared to be under age. The operator assured me that they employed no one under thirteen, but said they were annoyed a great deal by the little street waifs running in and out and disturbing the children who were employed at the looms. In fact, he actually found a number of little children behind some boxes as we were going through the mills," said Mr. Forsythe.

Doctor Jones snorted, and, jumping up, began to pace back and forth on the porch. "Can it be possible that you have been deceived into believing that those children that you saw behind the boxes were street children and not under age children that are actually employed in the mills day after day, sent to hide behind the boxes because the inspector was coming through?"

Mr. Forsythe coolly remarked that he had no reason to believe they were employed in the mills.

"I tell you, gentlemen," cried Doctor Jones, "thousands upon thousands of the children of our country are bound to a slavery that is a crime greater than the one that the emancipation of the negro righted. It is a stain on our nation as deep as blood and growing deeper every year.

"Look at that boy there," indicating Jean by a motion of his hand; "what will he be in ten years from now if he continues this ceaseless labor at the mines? He will be either in his grave or an ignorant, dwarfed creature, fit for nothing but to wield a pick or fire a blast for a certain amount of money, and then go to the polls and cast the ballot that has been put into his hand by some labor leader, or, when a strike is called, do his bidding even if that bidding is murder.

"Why? Just because he does not know any better. He has never had a chance to learn. He does not know the first principles of manhood. Educate him and what might he become?

"I am not talking against the miner or his union. Organized labor is all right in its place; but it would prove a far greater help in years to come if the children of these people could be educated. Then they could face the world with its labor and all its other problems as intelligent men. The grinding of the very heart's blood out of our children and compelling them to live the lives of brutes rather than human beings is the curse that makes all the curses of monopoly and the tyranny of capital possible."

"Forsythe, we have no apologies to make for our strong feelings on this subject," said Mr. Hathaway. "If you had been in as many homes in Minington, and had visited as many poor, crippled and deformed children as Doctor Jones has, you would not be surprised that he feels strongly about this thing. The problem of the age is how these children of toil can be educated. As the doctor has said, it is the stain of the century that we do not concern ourselves more about it, but stand peacefully by and let a million of little workers dwarf their bodies and souls so that some syndicate can crush a competitor, some mill owner's family dress in the elegant fabrics that the little toil-worn fingers have helped weave, or some manufacturer declare larger dividends to build more mills, to employ more children, to declare larger dividends to build more mills, and so the endless chain goes on, every link stained with the blood of innocent children whose 'angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven.'"

"I think the factory inspection system will largely remedy whatever evils of this kind really exist in our state. I shall at least do my part," said Mr. Forsythe as he arose to take leave.

Jean's attention was attracted to the conversation. He did not fully understand their meaning, yet in a vague and indistinct way they brought before his mind a comparison of the yelling, unruly crowd of men that he had often seen during the strike, with the quiet, well-bred ladies and gentlemen on the porch. As he looked at them sitting there, the blood mounted to his face, the old bitter feeling swelled in his heart, and for the first time he caught a glimpse of the difference between himself and Evelyn—between the mob during the strike and these men before him. He looked down at the poor, crooked letters on his slate that Evelyn had helped him make, how awkward and clumsy they were. Why, he could not yet write his own name and could only read the simplest words in the first reader. Then it flashed upon him that this was the difference; that this was the key for which he was unconsciously groping.

Even Penny, the little colored boy, had a better chance, for he had attended the day school, and had many advantages that Jean and the other children of the miners could never hope to enjoy.

As Mr. Forsythe arose to take leave the gentlemen walked over to where the children were.

"Evelyn, you have your usual class, I see," said her father.

"Yes, papa, and just see how well Jean writes. He made all of these letters tonight," and Evelyn showed them Jean's slate. The blood rushed again to Jean's face. He had become conscious that better things should be expected of a boy of his age.

Mr. Forsythe laid his hand on Jean's shoulder and said, "My boy, would you like to learn to read and write?"

"Yes, sir," replied Jean.

"Why don't you go to school, then?"

"I can't. I have to work in the breaker."

"How much do you get for your work in the breaker?" asked Mr. Forsythe.

"I usually get about $1.70 a week. Sometimes as much as $2."

"What do you do with your money?"

"Oh, sir, I hardly ever get any money. I get an order on the company's store."

"What would you do, Jean, if you had a chance to go to school every day?" said Doctor Jones.

"I would try so hard, sir, to learn the things that would make me a man like Mr. Hathaway," said Jean.

"Well, Hathaway, you have one admirer at least," said Mr. Forsythe, and the gentlemen laughed.

Penny's eyes were rolling and a broad grin was on his face.

"Young man, do you work in the breaker?" asked Mr. Forsythe.

"No, sah; I work in de fact'ry 'casionally."

As soon as Penny spoke Mr. Forsythe recognized him as one of the children he had seen behind the boxes while going through the factory.

"Did you work in the factory today?"

"Yes, sah; I seed you when de boxes tumbled down. My! Wasn't de boss mad?" said Penny, almost convulsed with laughter.

"Had all those children behind the boxes been at work?"

"Yes, sah; dey works dar every day."

Doctor Jones' eyes twinkled.

"I will have to look into that," said Mr. Forsythe as he walked away.

Kaufman County, Texas, two years ago voted out the saloons. After trying the dry policy for two years, another vote was taken May 30, and resulted in a greatly increased majority over the first election for a saloonless county.

Conditions of Religious Work in New York City

Robert Stuart McArthur.

New Problems in the Metropolis.

The remarkable increase in population during the last few years has introduced new difficulties into Christian work. New York now comprises an area of 327 square miles. She sits as a queen on her extensive throne. New York is the metropolis of the western hemisphere. Her population has considerably passed the 4,000,000 limit. She is thus, in population, the second city in the world, and in area, the largest city in the world. New York is to the new world what London is to the old world; and the day is coming when New York will be to the whole world what London is today. It is quite certain that in the near future New York will be the financial center of the world; she is largely that today. The increase in population within the last few years has been as undesirable as it has been great. An enormous percentage of the total immigration to America has remained in the city of New York.

Another difficulty in doing religious work is in the fact that the admirable subway systems of New York have greatly changed centers of population within a few years. Almost all the chief supporters of some church and mission schools have removed from their former neighborhoods and have gone to newer parts of the city, especially to the Bronx. The number of passengers carried daily on surface, subway, and elevated railways almost passes the belief of even our best informed citizens. New York is the home of all kindreds, tongues, and nations; forty languages or dialects are spoken in this city. Some quarters are as foreign as Russia, Hungary and Italy; in them, among the older people, not a word of English is heard. Five times as many languages as were spoken on the day of Pentecost are spoken every day in New York. This fact has its hopeful as well as its discouraging features. As Pentecost was the antidote to Babel, so the spirit of true Americanism and of genuine Christianity is today in New York; this spirit manifests itself in unifying linguistic differences, and in removing racial prejudices.

The World's Greatest Foreign Mission Field.

New York is really an enormous mission field. Within twenty-five miles of the city hall, more than one-fifteenth of the entire population of the United States is found. We have a population of nominal Protestants who are churchless of not less than 1,000,000. Our population increases at the rate of about 100,000 each year, and a great percentage of this increase is foreign, or of foreign descent. Only about 20 per cent of Greater New York is of purely American descent. It is not too much to say that the greatest foreign mission field in this world, in the same area, is in New York. In striving to evangelize New York, we are doing much toward the evangelization of the whole world. Without going outside of New York, we can largely obey Christ's command, "Go ye into all the world." The population of foreign descent is greater than the entire population of Chicago.

In the Borough of Manhattan, each person out of every five is a Hebrew. Thirty-six daily newspapers are published in New York in other languages than English. Home and foreign mission work is here one work. Here heathen temples are erected and heathen services are performed. We must Christianize these heathen and semi-heathen peoples, or they will do much toward heathenizing us. We are finding that social settlements only partially solve our perplexing problems. The gospel of Jesus Christ is the divine catholicon for all the world's woes. The tent movements of the last few years have done great good, and they are the prophecy of greater and diviner things for Christ and the church in the near future.

The Religious Trend.

The religious trend is in the direction of more aggressive work than at any time for the past twenty years. The tent evangelistic campaigns in summer, begun four years ago, are largely new features of aggressive religious work. This work is being prosecuted with great vigor during the summer of 1908. It is one of the most hopeful features in the religious life of the city. Many more churches are now open than was formerly the case. Campbell Morgan, Len G. Broughton, Dr. Torrey, Dr. Chapman, Evangelist Wicker, and a few others have always large summer congregations. Summer schools for neglected children are also a new and successful feature in our work. There has thus been marked activity on many lines within the last five years.

In these respects all forms of religious work are vastly more hopeful today than they were ten or even five years ago. Then it was comparatively difficult to find many churches open in summer; and there were few tents for religious work in the city. Now many more churches are open, and tents are numerous. There will be two tents under Baptist auspices during the present summer; and there is good reason to hope that out of the work of one of these tents a church will eventually be organized. For several summers Calvary Church has conducted a tent, and it is hoped that a church will grow out of this effort, although this tent is not now directly under the care of this church.

A Comparison.

In some respects religious conditions are worse than they were a generation or even a decade ago; in other respects they are better. Then open theaters on Sunday were rare; today, closed theaters are the exception. Lecture halls are also open on Sunday, and illustrated and other popular lectures are given by men of wide reputation. These lectures draw upon church congregations as the theaters do not. Many churchmen will go to a concert or a lecture on Sunday, who would not go to a play in a theater. There is far less scrupulosity in this regard on the part of churchmen than there was even five years ago. This is one of the marked tendencies of our time. With all the organizations for the preservation of the Sabbath, the old-fashioned Sunday has practically disappeared. These tendencies draw largely from our church congregations. The result is that there are only about as many churches in the city as one has fingers on one hand which have large evening congregations. Great numbers of churchmen and churchwomen never attend the evening services of their own or of any other church. They go to church only once each Sunday.

Unfortunately, Sunday forenoon is smothered by the blanket-sheet newspaper; a part of the afternoon is rolled under the wheels of the bicycle and the automobile; and the evening hours are given to social entertainments. These remarks are not made of worldlings alone; they are made of many church members; and some of these are supposed to be excellent Christian people. They not only absent themselves from the second service, but they invite young men and women to Sunday night teas, and prevent them from attending God's house. They are training their own children to be habitual neglecters of the second service, and often of the first service also. These Sabbath-breaking churchmen and churchwomen are doing more to rob us of the sacredness of the holy day, than are the immigrants with their introduction of European customs.

It must be admitted that large prayer-meetings are things of the past. This result is due in part to the great distances between men's homes and their places of business. The subway has carried the people far from their churches and their offices. It is almost impossible for men to go to their homes, get their evening meal, and then go considerable distances to attend a prayer-meeting. The subways have somewhat changed the centers of population, and so have greatly reduced, in some instances, the size of the Sunday schools. The children, however, are not lost to all Sunday schools, as in many cases schools are organized in the newer parts of the city.

Down-town and Other Problems.

New York, as already suggested, is a great field for foreign missions. The down-town problem is ever present. Churches have moved away from neighborhoods where the population is larger than ever before, and where the people more than ever before needed and need the gospel. The removal of churches is a sad chapter in the history of the last two decades. The solution of this problem is the creation of at least partial endowments for down-town churches. If these churches had an income their work might go on, even after the former supporters had gone to New Jersey, to Brooklyn, to heaven, or to Harlem. A few pastors have been endeavoring, in recent years, to emphasize the importance of creating endowments. Several churches could easily be named in which we are now carrying on mission work with money which should be used in establishing new churches in the Bronx. In these down-town churches, once there worshiped many of our wealthiest members; but neither they nor their pastors had the foresight to create endowments. We are now carrying on the work at a great sacrifice in money, and at the expense of neglecting new fields in more hopeful parts of the city.

A Fair Balance.

It will thus be seen that, in some respects, the work is harder than ever before in New York. It will be seen that difficulties abound today which were unknown a few decades ago; but on the other hand it must be affirmed that the churches are reaching out more widely, and doing a much broader work than was attempted, or even contemplated, a few decades ago. Churchmen are doing an enormous amount of true Christian work outside of distinctively church organizations. This is true of parish houses, settlements, clubs, and kindred organizations by the half score. The totality of work for God with men is greater than ever before, although its form and method have considerably changed. Indirectly, if not directly, the church is a mightier force than ever before in the history of New York. Its power is felt in organized charities, and in a score of societies for the alleviation of suffering, and for the betterment of men, women, and children. Organized atheism is vastly less patent than it was twenty years ago. Materialism in its vigorous opposition to Christianity has wellnigh disappeared. The future is radiant with hope. God is in his heavens, Christ is on the throne, and his pierced hand is on the helm, and this weary old world is swinging forward into brighter light, sweeter peace, heavenlier life, and diviner love.

To Peary.

O Peary! with the scorching summer here,
And everybody paying double price
For little weeny, teeny bits of ice,
It dost no longer seem so very queer
That thou should'st have the bravery to steer
Thy ship up north where it is cool and nice.
I bet you smile whilst thinking thou hast twice
The fun we're having at this time of year!

And by-the-by, since thou dost understand
The Pole is an imaginary spot,
Why not imagine thou hast found it
And of time and money save an awful lot?
Would others track thee to that frozen land
To prove thou didst not find it?
I guess not!

Pin Money Ideas.

When Mrs. Jones was left a widow, at the age of fifty, her total assets were $150 cash, a small, plainly furnished cottage, and an immense store of courage and good nature. Her liabilities included a crippled grandchild, the child of her only son, who was orphaned before he was three years old. Mrs. Jones counted the child among her assets, contrary to the views of most of her neighbors. Of course there was the problem of ways and means to be considered. Her small sum of money could not last long, and something must be done. She must work, but it would have to be at something that would permit her to be near the child.

Dressmaking she knew very little about, plain sewing she could do, but that is poorly paid for as a rule. She was offered a place as matron in a rest-room of a down-town store, but she could not consider that, as it would keep her away from the boy, and the hours would be long. So Mrs. Jones thought, and planned, and the result of her planning appeared in the shape of dainty little announcements (the printing of which made quite a hole in the little balance at the bank) which went through the mails to the leading stenographers, bookkeepers, and other business women in town. The card read as follows:

"Mrs. Mary Jones, 236 Blank St., will rebind your skirts and darn shirt-waists, lace, and fine wearing-apparel at reasonable prices."

Several days passed and business began; like the "little peach of emerald hue," it grew and grew, and presently Mrs. Jones had to get an assistant, then two. Now she has all the work she wants, and it is the kind of work that is well paid for. Her work is well done, and one customer invariably brings another. She is earning a good living in her own home, where she can care for the child, and she is putting in the bank every month a little sum for the rainy day and old age which may come.—Selected.

When Quebec Was in New France.

Our neighbors in Canada have been celebrating with elaborate festivities the tercentenary of the founding of Quebec by Samuel Champlain. Plans were long since formed for this great fete and the preparations have been going forward with zest. Sir Wilfred Laurier, the dominion's charming premier, has been the moving spirit, perhaps, and has done much toward quieting the hot discussions which arose between the French and English Canadians. At first the French were inclined to resent the large participation of the English in celebrating the founding of Quebec as a French colony; but it seems too much to expect the English Canadians to stand aside after Wolfe's signal victory and the long years of British rule.

The fall of Quebec was one of the great tragedies of French history, shattering as it did all hope of French rule in America; but it is surely most fitting, as it is splendid, that England and France, no longer enemies, should join in celebrating the founding of Quebec by Champlain, and in honoring both Montcalm and Wolfe, to whom history gives nearly equal fame and to whom fate gave the same death.

The work of decorating the city began on July 15 and rehearsals for the great pageants were held nightly on the Plains of Abraham. On the same day the Prince of Wales and his suite sailed for Quebec from Portsmouth in Great Britain's newest cruiser battleship, the "Indomitable." The arrival of six British warships, three war vessels from France, and those of other nations, including our own battleship, "New Hampshire," was the signal for the commencement of festivities, and the celebration was formally opened on July 23 by the Prince of Wales. Wilfred Laurier made the address. Civil, religious, naval and military notables came to witness or take part in the ceremonies, processions and reviews; and the congress of foreign representatives included men from every court and nation.

One of the most interesting features of the celebration was the dedication of the Plains of Abraham as a national park. This was suggested by Earl Gray, the governor-general of Canada, and there is certainly no finer way to honor the great generals whose skill and bravery made the battlefield famous than by obtaining it for the permanent possession and enjoyment of the nation.

The military and naval parades, the solemn mass on the Plains of Abraham, the thanksgiving service in the Episcopal Cathedral, and the reënactment of Wolfe's landing and ascent and other splendid pageants were interesting and inspiring. Ten thousand spectators, on one day, saw the landing of Jacques Cartier and the planting of the cross of Christ on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and heard the gospel preached to the savages.

"In another scene they witnessed the coming of angels of mercy—those gentle women of old France who gave their lives to the cause of Christianity and civilization. Following these peaceful scenes the spectators caught a glimpse of the horrors of war in the brave defence of the fort by Dollard and his sixteen associates against a crafty lot of Iroquois. Another interesting sight was the arrival of the four traders and their taking possession of the country in the name of France. Still another was the historic episode when the undaunted Frontenac gave his memorable answer to the British General Phyps, 'At the mouth of my guns.' The final scene was one not easily to be forgotten. Side by side marched regiments of English and French in the quaint uniforms of 300 years ago in one grand parade. There were over 3,000 in the pageants."

To take part in these celebrations or even to see them was surely worth many a history lesson in realizing and revivifying the past.

It is a good year for Americans as well as Canadians to "brush up" their knowledge of the early days on our continent and revive that splendid history. There are too many boys and girls who think that America's history began at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock, for in our schools today there is far too little made of the great discoveries, the daring bravery, the indomitable courage of Champlain, La Salle, Marquette and their followers. It is a good year to re-read the fascinating histories of Parkman and to introduce to the boys and girls those thrilling stories of "Montcalm and Wolfe," of "La Salle and the Discovery of the Great Northwest," and of "The Jesuits in North America." Such novels, too, as "Le Chien d'Or," and "The Seats of the Mighty" make real for us many a scene in history and make those actors live again whose heroism and achievements made possible the larger life on our continent.

Infuriating.

Scottish folk are proverbially canny and prudent in money matters, and the following shows that the younger generation is no exception to the rule:

A teacher in a lowland school was taking mental arithmetic with a class of boys. She asked one urchin:

"How much would your mother give you to buy four pounds of tea at one and six a pound?"

"We ne'er get sae much at once as that, mum."

"Never mind that. Four pounds at one and six?"

"But we canna afford the one and six, mum. We always hae the one and twa."

"Answer the question. What would she give you to pay for four pounds of tea at——"

"Nawthin', mum."

"What do you mean by 'nothing'?"

"She'd na' gie' me only bawbees. She'd tell me tae ask the mon tae pit it doon."

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear! But supposing she did?"

With a pitying smile came the reply: "A can see ye're ne'er met ma mither mum."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

A New York Salon.

Mrs. Russell Sage is distributing her great fortune, not only with wisdom, but with nice feeling, originality and a sense of the gracious and beautiful which one likes to associate with a woman's beneficences. She has provided for a thorough and admirable restoration of the governor's room in the City Hall of New York; a room which has many historical associations and a great dignity of dimension and proportion, and at times has had dignity of furnishing. In a sense this room is the city salon, as the fine hall of the City College is its civil hall, for use on ceremonial occasions. The city hall has been preserved from the hands of the spoiler, sometimes called the restorer, through a long series of hotly contested struggles and it remains one of the most interesting and admirable examples of the best architecture of its period. By bringing back the ancient dignity and taste to the governor's room, Mrs. Sage has not only rendered a gracious service to the city, but she has put a valuable symbol before its citizens. Her latest gift to the metropolis has taken the form of provision for half a mile of rhododendrons in the park, and is not only of charming significance but of distinct originality.—The Outlook.

David's Exploits.

Hebrew history may be divided into a series of periods marked by the relation of the nation to other and neighboring peoples. Some of these are periods of subjection and some merely of struggle. But it is one of the ways in which the succession of national events may be marked off for purposes of remembrance. The earliest of these periods may be called the Egyptian. This includes not only the time of subjection in the region of the Delta, but as well the first age of colonization in Canaan, which was at that time to all intents and purposes an Egyptian province. The second age is the Philistine, for with these warlike dwellers in the southwest, who gave their name to the entire district of Palestine, the Hebrews waged a long-continued series of campaigns. During much of the period of the Judges and most of the age of Saul and David the Philistines were the ever-present menace, if not the actual masters of Israel. The latter history of the people falls easily into the Syrian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek and Roman periods.

Of the Philistine age David is the great hero. It was his victories over these fierce and dreaded foes, hanging ever on the flanks of Israel, that gave the nation a chance to develop into freedom and strength. From the political point of view the failure of Saul lay in his inability to cope with this enemy, which drained the resources of his land and kept the people in continued suspense and fear. That there were weaknesses in Saul's character which accounted for this inability there can be no doubt. But the great contrast between himself and David lay in the latter's aggressive and successful policy of masterful repression of Philistine inroads, finally leading to complete immunity from their attacks.

Trained by the Enemy.

It is a striking fact that some of the most successful campaigns have been waged by men who have learned the arts of their foes in the service of those very foes. Saul of Tarsus came out of the secret arcanum of Judaism to use with tremendous effectiveness the weapons of that system against itself. Washington learned in the British service the arts of war which he was to turn with such effect to the overthrow of the power of Britain. Martin Luther came forth from the training of a Roman priest to deal the papal power a blow from which it will never recover. David learned in the camps of Achish of Gath and in the campaigns of other Philistine generals the tactics he was to employ with such telling effectiveness in the later wars for the repulse of Philistia from the heights of Israel. There is no more symbolic event in his life than the fact that he killed Goliath of Gath with the giant's own sword.

The Armor-Bearer.

The two narratives which tell of David's introduction to the court of Saul are difficult to harmonize, for they differ in important particulars. In the early Judean narrative of David's life (1 Sam. 16:14-17: 11, 32-42, 42-48a, 49, 51-54) David is represented as a youth of skill both in music and in war, whom Saul brought to his court to sooth him with his minstrelsy, and presently made his armor bearer. When the Philistine giant defied the hosts of Saul in the campaign on the southwest flank of Judah, David insisted on a trial of prowess with the insolent foe, and upon his persistent demand, Saul allowed him to go. He first tried, however, to make him wear his royal armor; but when this could not be fitted to him, and he preferred his free and simple equipment, David went out and overthrew the giant. The downfall of Goliath led to a great victory for Israel.

The Shepherd Lad.

In the other account (1. Sam. 15:35b-16: 13; 17:12-31, 41, 48b, 50, 55-58) David, after his anointing by Samuel at Bethlehem, as we studied last week, was sent by his father Jesse to take supplies to his three older brothers in the army of King Saul. He chanced to arrive at the time Goliath the Philistine was insulting the ranks of Israel. David inquired concerning the rewards offered to the man that shall meet the giant, and asks to be allowed to undertake the hazardous attempt, much to the disgust of his brothers, who insist that his place is with the little flock in the field, and not in the exploits of the camp. But David persists, and is permitted to meet the giant, when to the amazement of all he conquers him. On his return bearing the trophies of his victory, Saul inquires of Abner who this stranger youth is, but no one knows till the general meets him, and learns his name and introduces him to the king.

David the Man of the Hour.

But whichever of these two narratives be taken as the record of the actual events of that day, David was a marked man from that moment. Whether he were the armor bearer of the king or an obscure and unknown lad from the shepherd service of Bethlehem, he was one whose spirit was needed to rouse the men of Israel to a sense of their power, and to point the way to national freedom and progress. Saul had shown all that was in him of valor and leadership, and it was not enough. The well of national refreshment was there in that parched and thirsty time, but he had nothing to draw with and the well was deep. David had come, and from that day the hearts of the people, not without a certain affection for their tall and valiant king, turned evermore to the young man of swarthy face and flashing eye, for in him lay their hope, and the Lord of hosts was with him.

Lesson X.—The Prophetic Messages.

The Prophetic Messages, as distinguished from the Prophetic Histories, include such books as bear the names of the prophets whose messages they contain. They are all included in the section of the Old Testament which begins with Isaiah and closes with Malachi, though not all the books in this section are properly speaking of this class. Such exceptions as Lamentations and Daniel will be treated in the appropriate place.

These prophetic messages are not arranged in chronological order in the Old Testament. The chief factor in their arrangement is manifestly their size. Like the epistles of Paul, they follow, to a certain degree, the order of their length. It is not difficult, however, to rearrange them in the order of their dates, and such a plan will naturally assist the Bible student in understanding these books. The means by which this reconstruction is to be accomplished are of course the references of the messages themselves to contemporary events.

The Jewish scholars divided the prophetic messages, or the "Latter Prophets," as they termed them, into two divisions, the "Major Prophets" and the "Minor Prophets." This division was made on the ground of relative size. In their arrangement the Major Prophets include Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The Minor Prophets include "The Twelve," as they were called, beginning with Hosea and ending with Malachi. In some enumerations of the Hebrew Scriptures this collection of shorter prophetic books was counted as a single volume, called the "Book of the Twelve."

The earliest of the prophetic messages was that of Amos. He was a farmer of Tekoah in Judah, who visited the northern kingdom in the reign of Jeraboam II (781-740 B. C.) and preached against the formal religious practices and the social injustice of the court and the people. His great theme is the righteousness of God and his judgment upon the nations that offend against his law, chiefly Israel and Judah, because they have been taught the will of God. The date of the book was about 750 B. C.

Hosea was a native of Samaria, and preached to his own nation. His prophetic service was the result of a domestic tragedy which ruined his home, and made him appreciate keenly the vicious character of the popular religion. This personal experience took place during the reign of Jeroboam II, and perhaps in the time Amos was preaching. But Hosea's prophetic work lay in the dark days of political disaster which followed, during the reign of the short-lived kings who brought Samaria to its end in 721 B. C. The emphasis of Hosea is upon the forgiving love of God, and his call to the nation to repent.

Isaiah was a resident of Jerusalem, and was called to his work as a prophet in the last year of the reign of Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah (739 B. C.). His activity continued for at least forty years, during the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah. His chief political efforts were directed to prevent Ahaz from forming an alliance with Assyria in 734 B. C., and in aiding the reforms and upholding the hands of Hezekiah. Most confident was his prediction that Jerusalem would be delivered from Sennacherib in 701 B. C., a conviction that was brilliantly fulfilled in the mysterious overthrow of the Assyrian army. His chief themes were the holiness of God, the certain destruction that should fall upon the nation for its sin, the survival of a righteous remnant and the future time of blessedness and peace. The messages of Isaiah are contained, with a few exceptions, in chapters 1-39 of the Book of Isaiah.

Micah was a contemporary of Isaiah, whose prophecies fell in the end of the reign of Hezekiah. He lived at Moreshetgath, on the western slope of Judah. His utterances were chiefly against the aggression practiced by the wealthy land-owners upon their tenants and dependents. The instrument which God will employ for the punisnment of the evil men of the times is the Assyrian power. His greatest utterances deal with the rise of the Messianic king and deliverer from Bethlehem (5:1-4) and the definition of God's demands as justice, mercy and humble reverence (6:8).

Nahum, whose message falls in the long period of almost total prophetic silence that followed the reign of Hezekiah, took as his theme the approaching downfall of Nineveh, the capital of Assyria. The date was probably about 640 B. C. Nineveh was conquered by the Babylonians in 607 B. C.

Zephaniah lived in the reign of Josiah, the reforming king who followed Manasseh and Amon, the persecutors of the prophets and the faithful. A recent invasion of the western lands by a hoard of devastating wariors, the Scythians, affords a warning of even worse disasters which may come unless the nation reforms its life. "The Day of the Lord" is the theme of the book. The date was about 605 B. C.

Habakkuk deals in his short message with the perplexity that arises from the rise of Babylon upon the ruins of Assyria, when the people of God had counted upon the fall of the latter as the end of their troubles. Refuge is found in quiet and faithful dependence upon God. The date is about 625 B. C.

Christian Endeavor

MESSAGE ON THE TOPIC.

Rev. Wm. S. Harpster in C. E. World.

The component parts of man are body and spirit, and with this complex nature there is the closest inter-relation, so that injury cannot come to either part of his nature without injury to himself as a whole. And a person developing only one side of his nature, to the neglect and detriment of another, is thwarting the purpose of the Creator.

I am glad that Christianity concerns itself with our body as well as with our soul. Is it not a fact that, in considering matters of religion, we are likely to leave the body out of account? And yet in this lesson we are told to glorify God with our body. "What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?"

And now as to "why to be healthy." A man with a healthy body is in a position to render better service to God and his fellow men than the man with a diseased body; and with disorder in the body there is danger of its bringing disorder to the mind and soul. So we can readily see the "why" to be healthy.

And now as to the "how." To the people whose work is such as to give them proper physical exercise to maintain strength of body my suggestions may not appeal. But athletics, rightly ordered, are certainly within the realm of religion.

In this age of wonderful activity, and in the rush and whirl in which we are caught up and carried forward, it is certainly necessary that we take time for recreation within proper limits, so that we may faithfully fulfill the Master's purpose.

There are recreations that are looked upon as legitimate by almost every Christian, but we should studiously avoid all amusements that are debasing and injurious or that would lead to the degeneration and ruin of others.

A strong, healthy body, a pure mind, and a clean soul—may this trinity of blessings be ours.

Quotations for Comment.

Christ is the Savior of the body and Christianity is the sanctification of the whole man.—W. T. McElveen.

God's will does not only run into the church and the prayer meeting and the higher chambers of the soul, but into the common rooms at home down to wardrobe and larder and cellar, and into the bodily frame down to blood and muscle and brain.—Henry Drummond.

God gives us few more valuable gifts than strength of body, and courage and endurance. We ought to cultivate them in all right ways, for they are given us to protect the weak, to subdue the earth, to fight for our homes and country if necessary.—Thomas Hughes.

WHAT'S THE SCORE?

Next to "What time is it?" this is the most frequent question heard in America. The children of this world, being wiser than the children of light, make elaborate preparations at an enormous expense in telegraph, newspapers, bulletin boards and telephone calls to give a prompt, accurate and reliable answer.

The Church of Christ is engaged in a transcendent conflict. The main thing, of course, is to press the battle to the gates. But it is well worth while from time to time to report the progress made. This encourages other churches. It inspires your own members. Somehow the victory seems more complete when we see it reported in print. And then it is helpful in many ways to have all the reports of all the churches gathered and tabulated, so that the entire progress of the cause can be seen at a glance. If there were anything wrong in statistics we should not read of three thousand and five thousand, and other numbers, in the Book of Acts.

At this season of the year the state secretaries are endeavoring to gather the annual reports of all the churches. In addition to the many regular reasons for prompt response to their request, the interests of our centennial make it highly important that every church and every member should be reported this year and next. Among other things, we hope to publish a Centennial Year Book, containing not only the usual information, but much additional matter including a complete list of churches.

If the representatives of any church have not received the annual report blanks from the state secretary, please write him at once and ask for them. Let everybody stand up and be counted. Let the perennial complaint about our statistics be removed by every one doing his part. The statistical secretary can only tabulate the information that comes to him. He is wholly dependent upon the state secretaries as they are upon the churches.

W. R Warren,
Centennial and Statistical Secretary.

A NEW BOOK OF JOSHUA.

An extremely interesting Aramaic MS. of the Samaritan version of the Book of Joshua —with striking variant readings—has recently come into the hands of Dr. Moses Gaster, Chief Rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews in England, and a well-known Hebrew scholar. Recently Dr. Gaster lectured to the Royal Asiatic Society on his discovery. He obtained the MS. during a visit to the Samaritan synagogue at Nablus last year. At first he did not think it of much value, but after careful examination he is convinced that it is an authentic copy of the old Hebrew original. Certainly it is not a modern forgery. The agreement with Josephus on many points in which the text differs from the Massoretic text used in our Bible must, says Dr. Gaster, convince the most skeptical that this modern copy is the reflex and direct copy of a version popular and current in the second century. The new book gives a definite date for the Creation, as the death of Moses is dated 2794 years after. In the description of the entry into Canaan, Joshua orders the counting of the people—an event not recorded in the Bible. The spies on their return from Jericho give their report to Joshua and the high priest Eleazer. In the story of the sin of Achan, Achan is said to have stolen not a Babylonish mantle, but a golden idol from a temple, and his guilt is discovered by the stones in the breastplate of the High Priest becoming dim when the name of the delinquent is pronounced. The story of the capture of Ai omits any reference to Joshua holding up his javelin, and says that the force sent against the city was 3,000 men, not 30,000, as in the Bible. The precise agreement—even in the difficulties of the language—of the account of the ruse of the Gibeonites with that of our version is very striking. A particularly interesting omission is that there is no mention of Joshua's invocation to the sun to stand still.

PRINCIPAL FAIRBAIRN.

The news that Dr. Fairbairn, for a score of years the head of Mansfield College, Oxford, has laid down his work, to give himself more fully to literary tasks, comes as a surprise, and yet the wisdom of the step is apparent. Dr. Fairbairn is perhaps the leading living theologian. As the author of "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology," and "The Philosophy of the Christian Religion," he is known to informed Christians the world over. He was the Haskell lecturer in India under the direction of the University of Chicago. He has visited the United States more than once and spoken in many of our leading cities. For these reasons the following sketch from the Christian World will be read with interest by our readers. It is from the pen of one whose acquaintance with him was long and intimate. He writes: "The first time I met Dr. Fairbairn was on the morning after his return from his Haskell lecture tour in India. Twelve hours earlier the Mansfield students, wild with enthusiasm, had unharnessed the horses that had brought the principal and his wife and daughter up to the college from Oxford station, and had rushed around the drive with the carriage, sending up rockets and waving Roman candles. Dr. Fairbairn, immediately after breakfast on the following morning, walked into the college, entered a room, and within fifty seconds was dictating letters to his private secretary. The simple act revealed the secret of his greatness.

"Generous in all other matters, Dr. Fairbairn is, in his own phrase, 'parsimonious of time.' In his Bathgate days he rose at six, prepared coffee for himself, worked at his book till one, and in the afternoon, either afoot or on horseback, created a reputation for faithful pastoral visitation. No Mansfield man lives who has not been exhorted to beware the morning pipe, the morning paper and the seductive arm chair. The parsimony of time is simply in order that Dr. Fairbairn may spend it royally on the great things of his life, the administration of his beloved college, the perfecting of his books.

"To be great is ordinarily to be incalculable: with Dr. Fairbairn to be great is to be inevitable. He preaches and lectures, as everyone knows, without notes, and the average length of a sermon is not less than fifty minutes. But, on his own confession, he has not been known to omit, through forgetfulness while speaking, any point in a prepared address. It is another revelation of the distinctive mark of his greatness. His sermons are so compact of logic and reason that to omit a single point is to break the chain. It is the same with his career. Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, and author of 'Christ in Modern Theology' and 'The Philosophy of the Christian Religion,' is the inevitable outcome of resolutions formed by a raw young minister among the hills around Bathgate forty-eight years ago.

"The fascination, therefore, of Dr. Fairbairn's personality is not that of the enigmatic and unexpected, but of the fiery pursuit of one high aim, deliberately conceived and unwaveringly followed. He is a Calvinist of action. As he brings down his hand with tremendous emphasis on the completion of an argument you see 'Predestination in the Stroke.'

But the man who would always see coldness associated with the domination of intellect would miserably miss the mark in estimating Dr. Fairbairn. To hear him preach is to see intellect at white-heat. His oratory, when once it is aflame, is radiant with passion, not because emotion overrides reason, but because reason kindles into flame with the intensity of its own conviction, the swiftness of its own irresistible logic. His favorite adjective in praise of a book is 'cogent.' And there is only one thing that will irritate Dr. Fairbairn into anything approaching anger,—the cocksureness of illogical ignorance. It is very rare indeed that he speaks with scorn but I shall never forget his accent when, years ago, he described an important address by a great religious orator as 'a mass of rhetorical irrelevances.'

Dr. Fairbairn's zest for his golf, however, is just as irrepressible as his passion for learning and logic. There is a lovely touch of the nature that makes us all kin in the vision of the most learned of living theologians flying upstairs two steps at a time to get into his tweed clothes in time for his Saturday afternoon foursome. Nothing short of the visit of a Cabinet Minister for the week end interferes with that afternoon, sacrosanct to golf. And even the Cabinet Minister may find himself met at the station by a wagonette bearing three 'dons' in very unprofessional attire and be wafted off to the links.

"This trained tenacity of mind, in sport and work, finds half its explanation in the fact that Dr. Fairbairn, again using his own phrase, is 'a vagrant Scot.' He leaves Scotland, but he never leaves the Scot. He glories in his own accent, and vigorously defends the Scot against the lack of a sense of humor, declaring with alliterative vigor that 'the English idea of a Scotsman is one of the chimeras created by Dr. Johnson and perpetuated in the pages of Punch.' If Dr. Fairbairn is a vagrant Scot he wanders only to return; for never in all the years of his life—and they are seventy next November—has he spent more than six months at a stretch without visiting the land of his birth.

"His ecclesiastical statesmanship is of a piece with the man. There is the long view, the careful calculation of material and method, stern adherence to a central principle and endless resource of mind in securing its adoption. It is given to few men, therefore, to retire with high ambitions so completely achieved; for he has created a theological college which has revolutionized the attitude of Oxford scholarship to Free Churchmen and affected the whole ministerial standard of education in England, he has dominated the recreation of theological education in Wales, and earned a world-wide reputation as an erudite theologian of the first rank. The moment of his retiral is characteristic. A weaker man would have held the reins of government longer till decadence set in in the College life. But Dr. Fairbairn leaves Mansfield College in the full-tide of its success and efficiency.

"After all, however, the ceaseless labors of almost half a century have only been possible because in the background was always what he has called 'the gracious peace' of his home. From the day when Miss Shields became Mrs. Fairbairn and entered the little manse at Bathgate till today, Dr. Fairbairn has had the consciousness that he could always step back from 'the daily dust of life' into a quiet resting-place. So he will go to his house, 'Blucairn,' in Lossiemouth, overlooking the Moray Firth, to complete his long-promised book on the Gospels, labors which will be frequently broken, one may hope, by rounds of golf on his favorite links."

THE CHRISTIAN AND THE BIBLE.

By Rev. David Smith.

Never let a day pass without reading a portion of the Holy Scriptures. It need not be large: a few verses are sufficient. But one thing is indispensable—that you should read it devoutly and expectantly. The Bible is not an end, but a way. Its function is to lead past itself to the Living Lord who stands behind it; and unless we get through to Him, reading it is of no avail: we might as well read a paragraph of the newspaper. And so we should go to the Bible seeking him. When we open it, we should lift up our hearts in acknowledgement of the Holy Spirit and supplication for his promised aid; and, as we read, we should keep Jesus before us and listen for his voice, like St. Vincent Ferrer, who always studied the Word with the crucifix before him. I should think that for most the best time for this spiritual exercise would be the close of the day, ere retiring to rest. The pause which it demands, brief though it be, is unobtainable in the haste of the morning and the pressure of the day. But never begin the day without God. Ere you go out into the world, kneel down, if only for three minutes, and commit yourself into his keeping and implore his aid. The morning dew keeps the garden fresh all through the sultry hours. And there is much efficacy in the godly observance of family worship. It is good for us all, young and old, to gather at least every evening round the Word and hear its gracious instruction.

Seasons of devotion are indeed necessary, but remember, we must carry the devotional spirit all through our life. We must set the Lord always before us. This is the secret of a godly and blessed life—to accept our common tasks as the Lord's appointments, his will concerning us, and discharge them for him, believingly, lovingly, and faithfully. Thus work becomes worship; laborare est orare; and the Lord is with us all along the dusty highway, and not only in the cool of the evening. There is less need then for pauses and escapes. "In the intervals of time," says Saint Cyran, "where you can and when you can, pray always to God; and instead of troubling yourself about special times of prayer, be content to offer yourself to God again and again through the day." It is told of Johann Albrecht Bengel that he was in the habit of sitting very late over his work, and once a friend who was staying in his house thought he would like to hear his closing words to the Master he was serving so faithfully. He sat, and waited and waited, while Bengel went on diligently with his work. At last the scholar laid down his pen and dropped on his knees. The friend listened attentively, and heard Bengel utter one simple sentence: "Lord Jesus, things are just the same between us." This is the devout life—when we can pause in the midst of our tasks and, with no sense of estrangement or of interruption of our relations with Christ, let our hearts go out to him in confidence and desire.

A new gallery has been placed in the church at Sheridan, Colo., for the accommodation of a growing Sunday school. O. A. Adams is the minister.

H. H. Harmon and the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., are holding union Sunday evening services with the Baptists during a part of the summer.

Dr. Royal J. Dye expects to return to Bolenge, Africa, in October. Mrs. Dye will not return at this time. She will remain until later.

W. J. Minges begins his pastorate in Valley Junction, Iowa, with the encouragement of a good number of additions to the church in regular meetings.

Iowa has some successful women among the preaching forces of the state. Mrs. E. F. Boggess preaches at Prairie Home, and Mrs. Walter Harmon at Altoona.

DeForest Austin, formerly editor and publisher of the Nebraska state paper, who went to California for his health, is reported to be in a very serious condition.

John M. Home, pastor of the Grant Park Church, Des Moines, will spend August in Washington, D. C., preaching for the Vermont Ave. Church while F. D. Power is absent from his pulpit.

George A. Henry of South Bend, Ind., will supply the pulpit of the University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, for a Sunday or two toward the close of the vacation of C. S. Medbury.

The Sunday schools of the Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, and the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., will enter into a contest September 1 to last for three months.

The men of the churches in Des Moines, Iowa, have organized a Disciples' Union for that city, to promote the fellowship of the churches and also to have oversight of the mission work in the city.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the week ending July 22 were $7,871.78, a gain of $605.17. It is hoped this gain will continue until Sept. 30, when the books close for the current missionary year.

J. P. Meyers has been with the brethren in Shelbyville, Ind., for six months. Progress of the church is evident in frequent additions and in the payment of $2,000 on the church debt. The balance of $4,000 has been provided for. The outlook is hopeful.

W. H. Drapier asks us to correct a statement published in other papers which omitted his name as one of the charter members of Bethany Assembly. He has been identified with our cause in Indiana for a generation and more and now resides in Indianapolis.

L. C. McPherson of Wellsville and R. N. Miller of Richmond Ave., Buffalo, exchanged pulpits for the month of July. Bro. McPherson labored seven years in Buffalo prior to his work in Havana, while Bro. Miller came to Buffalo from Wellsville. Thus in a sense it was a visit home for each.

The Committee appointed by the New York Christian Missionary Convention to confer with the Trustees of Keuka College, Jos. A. Serena, Robt. Stewart and L. C. McPherson have held one meeting with the college authorities and will make its report to the New York State Board shortly.

The church at Roseburg, Ore., pledged $300 for the new mission boat on the Upper Congo, to be known as "The Oregon." This is to help our important work in the Congo Free State. The church also at Eugene, Ore., pledged $500 for the same purpose. The churches in Oregon propose to furnish this steamer at a cost of about $15,000.

There is a young man and his wife, splendidly educated and well equipped, ready to go to the Upper Congo and to open a new station at Longa, if their traveling expenses and outfit money could be provided. Their salary has already been secured. If some large-hearted friend or friends would furnish about $1,200, it would insure these splendid people for that important field.

Charles M. Fillmore, pastor of the Hillside Church, Indianapolis, Ind., writes, "Our choir leader, Bro. E. C. Mannan, has decided to enter the field as a singing evangelist. He has an exceptionally fine voice, sings a gospel solo with unusual sweetness and power, is of splendid personal character, and has a winning personality. Evangelists or pastors may address him at 1013 East Morris street."

The Queen Anne Church, Seattle, Wash., J. L. Greenwell, minister, will, in the future, support a missionary in the Congo Free State. This church is less than two years old. They have no permanent church home. The minister says, "I do not feel that we have done any more than we should have done, if as much. We are stronger and happier in our work here because of our larger vision and service.

F. B. Huffman, Eureka, Cal., recently made a circuit of the globe and visited many of the mission stations of the Foreign Society. He is enthusiastic over the work that is being done and feels that it should be enlarged. He is hoping that our people will enlarge the work in every direction. This is the universal testimony of every Christian who has an opportunity to become an eye witness to what is being done.

The church at Delta, Colo., has extended a unanimous call to A. N. Glover of Orange, Cal., to become its minister. He has accepted and expects to begin his work the first Lord's Day in August. Bro. Glover is well remembered as a former pastor of the church at Colorado City, where he did successful work. He has been very successful in his four years' work at Orange, Cal., and is greatly beloved by the church.

THE STATE CONVENTION.

As announced last week, the arrangements for the state convention of Illinois at Chicago are maturing satisfactorily, and a large attendance is assured. Both the program committee of the state board and the local committee representing the Chicago Christian Business Men's Association and the Ministerial Association have carried on their work with enthusiasm and excellent results.

One of the interesting features of the convention this year will be a men's banquet held at the Auditorium Hotel. The work of Christian men in the different religious bodies has been emphasized during the past two years as never before. One of the most interesting features of the recent Missouri state convention was the organization of a state brotherhood of Christian men. Those

HEALTH AND INCOME.

Both Kept Up on Scientific Food.

Good sturdy health helps one a lot to make money.

With the loss of health one's income is liable to shrink, if not entirely dwindle away.

When a young lady has to make her own living, good health is her best asset.

"I am alone in the world," writes a Chicago girl, "dependent on my own efforts for my living. I am a clerk, and about two years ago through close application to work and a boarding house diet, I became a nervous invalid, and got so bad off it was almost impossible for me to stay in the office a half day at a time.

"A friend suggested to me the idea of trying Grape-Nuts which I did, making this food a large part of at least two meals a day.

"Today I am free from brain-tire, dyspepsia and all the ills of an overworked and improperly nourished brain and body. To Grape-Nuts I owe the recovery of my health, and the ability to retain my position and income."

who united to form this most needed and promising body signified the fact by joining hands in a circle which extended completely around the interior of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church.

It has long been felt that Illinois needs some form of association like this. Perhaps there is no better way to get men into touch one with another than to convene them at a table where the good cheer of social intercourse may develope into practical union of sentiment under the direction of speakers who can point out the great services which Christian men may render to the kingdom of God.

It was at first the plan of the Business Men's Association to provide the banquet and invite a select company of business men and preachers from other parts of the state to accept their hospitality for the occasion. But the impossibility of extending such an invitation to the large number of men who ought to be present and enjoy the event made it necessary to revise the plan. It has been decided to widen the invitation to include a large number of the representative men of the state, preachers and business men. The Association will still carry out its plan of contributing as far as it is able to this event, but in order to make it possible on the larger scale, the guests will bear the expense of the dinner at a special price per plate. This leaves the Association, which consists of about thirty-five business men of this city, free to extend a much wider invitation, and to bear the same proportion of the expense by taking care of the many incidental expenses connected with the occasion. The speakers will be representative of the highest ministries of Chicago for social uplift. It will a memorable occasion. It need hardly be added that no effort will be made to raise money for any purpose.

This banquet is but one of many features which will make the convention notable.

CHURCH EXTENSION NOTES.

On July 15th an up-to-date map, with an up-to-date exhibition of our Church Extension work, was mailed to all the churches where we could get addresses of pastors, correspondents or elders. The maps cost the Board $188 and about $130 in postage to mail them, and about $30 in clerical help. The Board of Church Extension can only expect good returns from this investment as pastors, correspondents and elders use them well by putting them in conspicuous places in our churches and calling attention to them.

Please post up the Church Extension Map. Don't consign it to the waste basket. It is the Lord's money that pays for the Maps. A good offering for Church Extension will be secured only by faithful people in each church interesting themselves and then enlisting the indifferent.

Will the pastors please order their supplies for the Annual Offering for Church Extension which begins on September 6th? "Prominent Points on Church Extension" is a leaflet to be distributed to the people. It will count greatly in giving information. Then there are the usual collection envelopes. Send a postal card to G. W. Muckley, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and supplies will be mailed free.

The Board of Church Extension just received a $200 gift on the Annuity Plan from a friend in Minnesota. This is the 223rd gift to the Board. Send Annuity money to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

DEDICATION AT NELSONVILLE, O.

July the 19th was a great day in the history of the Nelsonville Church, for it marked the formal dedication of their new workshop to the worship and service of God. The building is a modern solid brick, built on the Akron plan and presents an artistic appearance both outside and in. The architecture is Romanesque, the woodwork oak, the walls are frescoed in green and cream and the appointments of the structure are complete in every way. Pres. Miner Lee Bates had charge of the dedicatory exercises and proved himself a peer in the work. He raised about six thousand dollars during the day and far exceeded the expectations of the most optimistic and did it altogether through the appeal to the highest and best motives. I know of no man who can better keep the spirit that such a day should have and at the same time persuade the audience to give with the liberality that the occasion demands. His sermons were truly great and yet so simple that every one could appreciate them. E. S. DeMiller, pastor of the Glenville Church in Cleveland, a former pastor, who inaugurated the building movement here, spoke in the afternoon at the communion service. The building complete cost about $13,000 as it stands, but it will take another thousand to finish up the unfinished front, basement and do some other work that we want to do yet. The money raised practically takes care of the indebtedness and this is the more remarkable owing to the fact that this is the most severe financial panic that this valley has experienced in a score of years. The church has a membership of about 300 and the Sunday school enrolls over 600, with an average attendance of between 300 and 400. There were 453 present dedication day, and 437 the Sunday preceding, with offerings of $50 and $27, respectively. The present pastor is just beginning his third year. During the two years preceding, there has been about one hundred additions to the church without outside help. The outlook for the future was never so bright.

A FOOD DRINK

Which Brings Daily Enjoyment.

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of the enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a stimulant like coffee.

"I began to use Postum eight years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my nights long, weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used 'cream and no sugar' I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look—'like a new saddle.'

"Then I tasted it critically and I was pleased, yes, satisfied, with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years.

"I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like Postum in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

CONCERNING THE PROPOSED UNION AT ROCKFORD, ILL.

Since it is quite generally known that negotiations have been in progress for several months past, looking toward the merging of the Central Christian and First Baptist Churches of Rockford, it is perhaps fitting that a statement should now be made to the public. It is about seven months since committees were appointed by both churches, and conferences were begun. After a great deal of time and labor had been spent by the two ministers a plan of union and constitution was drawn, and finally approved by the joint conferenee committees. The new church was to be equally a Baptist and a Christian Church, so far as ecclesiastical and fraternal relations with the respective communions with which each is connected are concerned, although it was specifically stated in the introduction, "This is a Church of Christ." The new organization was to be called "The United Church," with "First Baptist-Central Christian," in small type underneath; the Lord's Supper was to be observed the first and third Sundays in each month; the gospel invitation was to be extended at the close of each regular preaching service; all missionary and benevolent money was to be divided equally between the boards of the two bodies. The First Baptist Church has a holding society, which holds their property, and which, according to the peculiar statute under which it was incorporated, can not be dissolved with jeopardizing the rights of the property-holders. So the members pledged themselves to change the name of this society, wherever it appears in the constitution, to correspond to the name of the new spiritual body. In the meantime, the Central Christian Church agreed to deed their present property to the society of the United Church, and place the deed in escrow until the proposed changes were actually made. A little more than a month ago, the Central Christian Church, by a large majority, voted to approve of the proposed union under the terms of the plan of union and constitution referred to.

The Baptists did not wish to act until they recived denominational advice. The Rock River Baptist Association left the matter of advising the First Baptist Church with the Missionary Cimmittee of that organization, instructing them to seek wider counsel from leading Baptist ministers of Chicago. The Chicago men whom they consulted unanimously approved of the merger. After a long and tedious delay, the Missionary Committee finally reported that they could see no reason why the union should not be consummated. A meeting of the First Baptist Church was called for the purpose of voting on the question. On the eve of this meeting this committee sent in a "supplemental report" which reversed their former opinion and strongly disapproved of the union. This later report, together with the hostile attitude of one or two of their prominent members, had a marked effect upon their members, and the vote resulted in a bare majority of one in favor of the union. They then adopted the following resolution, and addressed it to "The Pastor and People of the Central Christian Church:

"Whereas, The chairman of the Missionary Committee of the Rock River Baptist Association has issued, in the name of the committee, a 'supplemental report' qualifying their original action and disapproving of the proposed union of the First Baptist and Central Christian Churches of Rockford; and

"Whereas, The previous unanimity of the First Baptist Church for this union, as expressed by repeated votes, has thus been shaken so that it appears that a large number of its members now believe that union is not feasible:

"Resolved, That, in the judgment of the pastor and people of the First Baptist Church, a union, otherwise greatly to be desired, is impracticable at the present time."

Hence the whole matter is to be dropped after many weary months of labor and anxiety. Speaking from a broad point of view, it is greatly to be regretted that the project must be thus defeated although conditions have come to be such that a harmonious union would not now be possible. The basis of union, however, was fair and just, and no vital, Scriptural principle would have been sacrificed. It is not true, as has been stated in the Baptist Standard, and elsewhere, that the new organization would have been distinctly a Baptist church. It would have been "The United Church" (the words "of Christ" being plainly implied) of Rockford, seeking to help answer the Master's prayer, "that they may all be one."

Most fraternally, W. D. Ward.

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS BY BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION FOR FIRST NINE MONTHS COMPARED WITH LAST YEAR.

Churches.
For last year	$11,266.15
For this year	8,688.49
A falling off of	$ 2,579.66
Individuals
For last year	$ 8,908.60
For this year	16,790.84
A gain of	$ 7,882.24
Total gain	$5,302.58

The Board is grateful for the gain in receipts. The falling off in receipts from the churches is no doubt due to a real or fancied closeness of money. A deep interest on the part of the churches in the Annual Offering in September, will more than make up this loss.

Number of loans closed, 69, aggregating	$140,025.00
Returned loans	64,035.76
Interest received	17,779.47

Note that 69 churches have been aided to the extent of $140,025.00, making the average loan about $2,300.00. More work is being done in our cities, hence the larger must be our loans. We are not neglecting the smaller towns, but since the Fund has grown we are able to help the long neglected city missions.

The returns on loans and interest receipts are not so large as last year because the churches that have our loans are all pleading hard times and hence asking to delay their payments. Our older and stronger churches should take up the burden and send larger offerings in September.

BEHIND IN RECEIPTS.

The Foreign Society is several thousand dollars behind in receipts on the year. This is a source of no little anxiety to us. We had confidently hoped that there would be a considerable increase. Many have worked hard for a great advance.

Complaints of hard times come from every quarter. Some churches have not responded with more than half as much as last year. Thousands of our people are out of employment on account of the money stringency. Not since 1893-4 have we had such a widespread complaint of money stringency. The present political agitation, no doubt, helps also to divert attention.

In spite of all this, however, the churches have stood loyally by the work. There has been a small gain in the number of contributing churches, but a small loss in the receipts from the churches as churches. Many, however, have given far beyond all previous records. The loyal preachers have stood by the work in a most heroic way.

The greatest loss is in annuities. Many who expected to give on this plan have been unable to collect moneys coming to them or to turn property into cash.

There is yet time and opportunity to regain the present loss and turn apparent defeat into victory. There are already signs of a renewed interest. During the first fifteen days of July there was a gain of fifty-nine contributing churches and 209 contributing Sunday-schools, and a gain in the regular receipts of $6,401. Many Living-link churches, which have not sent in all their gifts, will yet rally and increase the receipts. Indeed, we have confidence that when the facts are known, all classes of churches will put forth a special effort to relieve the situation, and especially the churches that have given in former years, but have not responded this year. We are receiving many expressions of anxiety and genuine interest from friends on all hands.

It is known to many of the friends that some twenty new missionaries are under appointment. and stand ready to go forth to their several fields in September, if the Executive Committee sees its way to send them. It will be a great disappointment to the workers on the fields and to those under appointment if they are not permitted to go.

As a matter of course, whatever is done. we must depend chiefly upon the leadership and vital interest of the preachers. We hope to hear from all classes of friends at an early date that we may know how to plan the work toward the close of the year.

from there visit Rome and other principal places in Europe on the route to London. After seeing England, and it may be, "Auld Scotland," too, I hope to cross the Atlantic, and once more set foot on the soil of beloved America, from which I will have been absent about three years and a half. I wish I could fall in with one or more persons from the home land, either in Egypt or Palestine, that would be touring in the countries I have mentioned. Anyone intending to visit those places about the time I have indicated could address me either here or in care of Thomas Cook and Son, Port Said, Egypt, providing my company in those lands would be acceptable to them.

At Easter time I had the pleasure of attending the conference of the Churches of Christ in this state, as a delegate from the church in Lismore where I minister. On Easter Sunday I was accorded the honor of delivering the conference sermon The conference was held at the Enmore Tabernacle, Sydney, where G. T. Walden is pastor of the largest congregation of our people in Australia. The annual conferences of all the states of Australia, and also of New Zealand, are held during the Easter holidays. The one which I attended at Sydney was said to greatly excel all others of the state in previous years. The reports showed that great gains, in every way, had been made over previous years. The amount of missionary money raised, additions to the churches, new churches organized, and preachers who had moved into the state, all went to show that most encouraging progress had been made during the year's work. No more intelligent, earnest or devoted Christian people can befound anywhere, than those one meets with at an Australian conference. And I may add that I have never anywhere seen a more generous hearted brotherhood than I have met with in Australia and New Zealand. Such liberality as one meets with among our peoples in these countries deserves success and is bound to succeed grandly in the long run.

Australian people and papers are full of the proposed visit of our American fleet to the shores of their country. Everybody is on tiptoe, and is talking about the great event which is to take place next August or September. It is generally thought to be an event of much importance to this commonwealth—that it will be a means of strengthening the cords of friendship that already exist between this large and progressive country and the great American republic. No pains will be spared, to not only make it a most pleasant and profitable visit for the officers and crews of Uncle Sam's fleet, but an event of world wide importance. Vast crowds of people, from all parts of the commonwealth, will assemble at both Sydney and Melbourne, the two cities where the great fleet is to cast anchor for a week or so at each place.

"EmpireDay" was fittingly celebrated throughout Australia, as well as in other parts of the British empire. The writer was invited to make a patriotic speech at the celebration held here in honor of the day, which he gladly accepted. Empire Day is the 24th of May, the birthday of the late Queen Victoria, and is celebrated in part to keep in memory her great and greatly revered name.

Steps are being taken by the brotherhood of Australia to hold a centennial celebration in Sydney at Easter time of next year.

That time is chosen so that the celebration may not in any way conflict with the greater one to be held at Pittsburg the following autumn. The one to be held here is intended, in part, to create a desire among the brethren to send a large delegation to Pittsburg, in order to swell the numbers there; and also to reap as much benefit for this country as possible from the Pittsburg gathering. I look for a large delegation from Australia at Pittsburg in 1909. Hugh T. Morrison.

WHY CHOOSE HIRAM?

1. Because there you will receive the individual attention from instructors which is the unsolved problem of the large college.
2. Because intellectually, morally and socially you will rank yourself. Wealth or poverty, social condition at home or "previous condition of servitude" will neither help nor hinder.
3. Because there you may learn to think for yourself, without throwing away faith and belief.
4. Because coming in contact with Hiram's world-wide interests you will grow.
5. Because on graduation you will have a diploma that counts for something in the world of action.

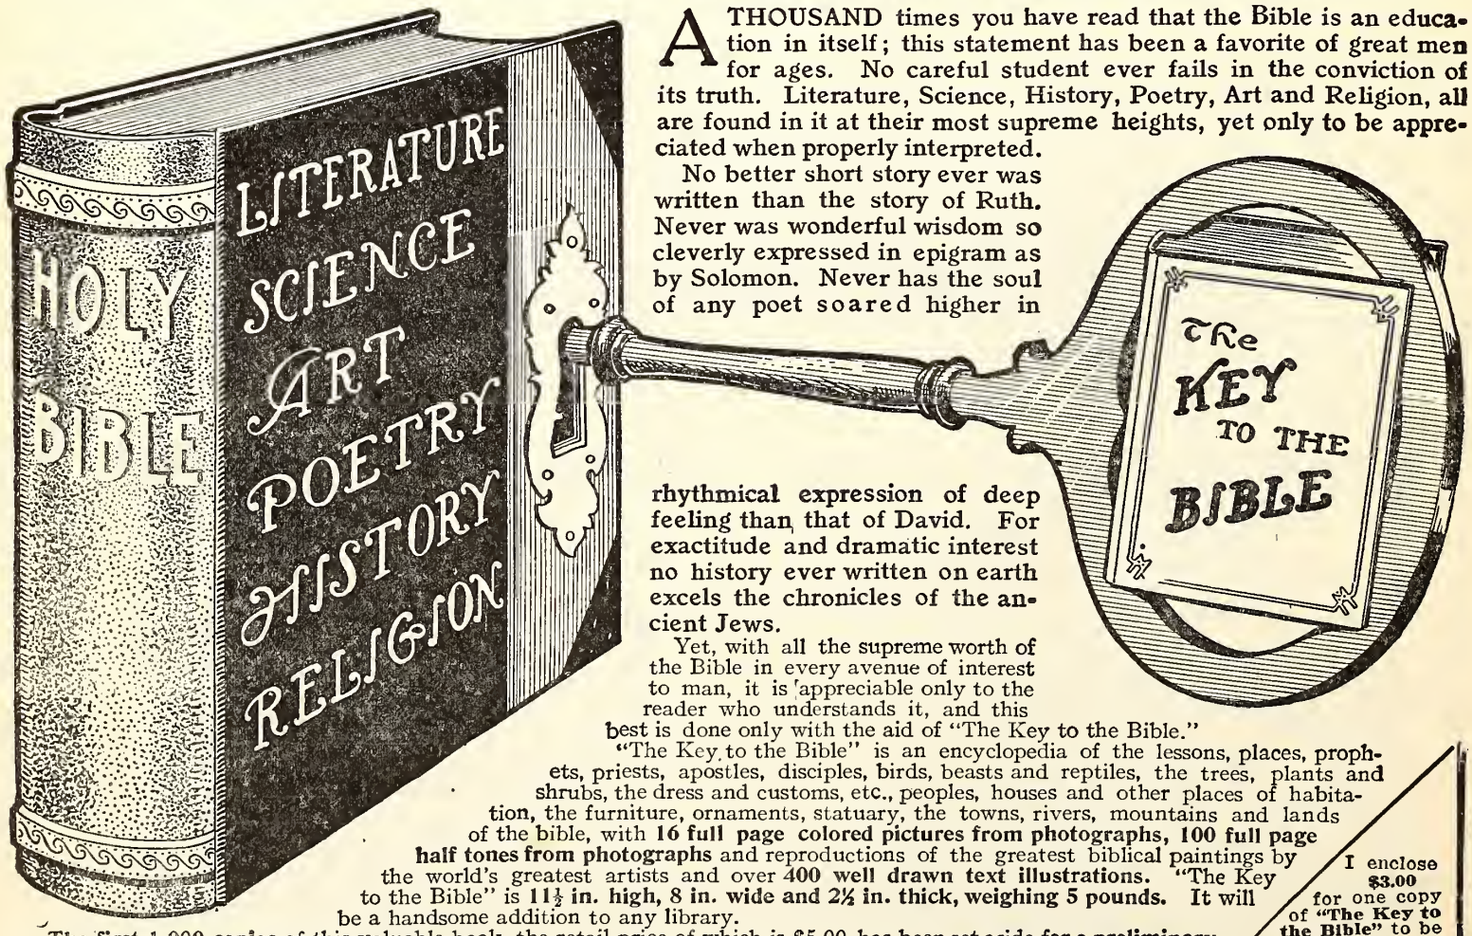
The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.

Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples, houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the Preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

I enclose $3.00 for one copy of "The Key to the Bible" to be sent prepaid.

THE ROAD OF THE LOVING HEART.

Oh, what is the pathway white, with parapets of light,
Whose slender links go up, go up, and meet in heaven high?
'Tis the Road of the Loving Heart from earth to sky.

Who made the beautiful road? It was the Son of God,
Of Mary, born in Bethlehem, He planned it first, and then
Up the Road of the Loving Heart he led all men.

Was it not hard to build? Yes, all his years were filled
With labor, but he counted not the cost nor was afraid,
No Road of the Loving Heart is cheaply made.

The shining parapet in tireless love was set,
A deathless patience shaped the treads and made them firm and even;
By the Road of the Loving Heart we climb to heaven.

May I follow this path of souls which leads to the shining goals?
Yes, Christ has opened the way to all which his blessed feet once trod,
And the Road of the Loving Heart he made is the Road to God.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

Church Organization.

The impulses of formative years carry far into mature life. Early habits are not easily disowned. A new body of people, assembled for the advocacy of an important but neglected truth, usually react from the situation which brings them into being, and sometimes go a long way in an opposite direction.

The Disciples of Christ came into being as a distinct body of people for the purpose of giving testimony upon the theme of Christian unity. In the early stages of their experience they discovered that the human devices in current use in the churches were the most potent factor in preventing the union for which they labored. So they began the work of protest and removal. This was the origin of the plea for the restoration of apostolic Christianity.

One of the points in which the early church appeared to differ radically from the churches of that time was in the matter of church organization. The early churches were framed upon a free and simple plan as it seemed. Each was independent so far as its worship and work were concerned, yet they were held together in tender bonds of affection, co-operation and loyalty to the Head of the Church.

The fathers discovered that the departure from this ideal had been radical and disastrous. From being a free group of closely knit yet independent churches, the bodies of Christians with which they were acquainted had become ecclesiastical organizations, with such complex machinery that the end was often lost to sight in the machinery. Men were striving for offices in the church, as if it were a political body, and the grace of God was limited to forms and ministries. Against all this they set their faces, and with pen and voice pleaded for a return to simpler things.

They were not mistaken, nor was their word without effect. Indeed they had powerful allies in the spirit of democracy which was then beginning to awaken in the men of the western world, and in the disintegration which had already begun to manifest itself in the church machinery about them. The democratic movement has made itself felt in all the churches. Old and venerated fabrics are trembling with age and weakness, and changes are coming daily. The strongly centralized churches are fighting a life and death battle with the spirit of the age, which they mistakenly regard as hostile to religion, but which is really only hostile to ecclesiasticism. Protestantism and evangelicalism need waste no time fighting the organizing side of Romanism and establishment. These are having troubles of their own, and their foes are of their own households.

But just here arises the danger of too wide a swing of the pendulum in the direction of freedom and independency. The Disciples have not only gone to the limit of uncontrolled freedom in church organization, but some way beyond it. The churches of our brotherhood are not only independent of each other in all the affairs of administration, but they are actually only in part responsive to any sense of brotherhood, mutual responsibility or common welfare. Congregationalism among us has almost gone the length of chaos. The repudiation of authority verges upon anarchy.

A church may dismiss a minister or a member for such causes as should be regarded as final and unquestionable, and yet discover with astonishment and indignation that the minister or member has been taken into full membership and good standing in some sister church, and the name of order and discipline has been outraged thereby. A disgruntled minority in some church may foment a movement to oust the minister, failing in which they withdraw and form a new congregation, while all the other churches of the brotherhood in that city or district sit by with folded hands helpless to protest effectively against what is apparently a scandal and sin.

A church decides to move its location and without consulting the good of the entire cause, invades the very block or precinct of a sister church, and that not of some other body, but of our own brotherhood. Yet no one is empowered to even give advice, and such if offered is likely to be resented and cast aside.

A good and holy work may be inaugurated in a community, either near or afar, and the churches for the most part unite in the effort. Yet some with equal blessing and responsibilities wait idly by and lift no hand to help. In all these cases we are accustomed to insist that the brotherhood is helpless, and that the principle of independence commits us to just such occasions of stumbling to the end of the day. But no one really believes it, and our brethren of other religious bodies of the congregational order behold with astonishment the looseness of our methods and the resulting ineffectiveness of much of our work.

The Disciples owe it to themselves, their past history and their present opportunities, to study the question of organization as it bears upon the success of our efforts in the days to come. We dare not become an anarchy of pious people. The churches should be more closely joined together, not by ecclesiastical bonds, but by closer fellowship and some better plans of co-operation. The churches of a city, county, or district ought to meet in council over the wisdom and desirability of planting new churches, and should determine the places where they should be started. They should counsel about the choice of ministers, as to whether they are worthy men and can work in harmony with those already in service in that field.

They should have a voice of warning that would be heard when any plan was proposed by a local church that threatened the welfare of all. They should be able to give such advice as would be heeded to a church that threatens by foolish conduct to bring reproach or ridicule upon the brotherhood.

It hardly need be added that such an idea of unified and orderly action leads naturally and inevitably to representative gatherings of the churches in district, state and national conventions composed of men and women who really speak for the churches from which they come, and whose decisions, while not authoritative in any compulsory sense, will at least be the voice of the churches fully, frankly and forcibly expressed. A century of history is sufficient time for a great people to have worn the garments and played with the toys of childhood. When the time comes for maturer plans and ampler methods wisdom suggests adjustment to the new age.

Far Less Liquor Is Sold.

The internal revenue reports on the production of whiskys during the past few months tell a tale of a slump that is unparalleled in the history of the liquor interests of the country. Eighty per cent of the standard whiskys produced in America comes from the three states of Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Maryland, consequently the comparative figures on whisky production in these three states show the general trend of conditions.

The decrease of whisky production in Kentucky from October 1, 1907, to March 1, 1908, was from 57 to 79 per cent. The decrease in Pennsylvania during the same time ranged from 7 to 37 per cent, while the decrease in Maryland was from 44 to 60 per cent.

Beer Falling Off Too.

For a long period of years the brewers, despite all the temperance agitation and the restrictive and prohibitory laws which have been put into effect, have "pointed with pride" to the record of the internal revenue commission, which has shown a constant increase in the consumption of fermented liquors. This increase, according to the official statistics, has averaged about 10 per cent a year and as long as such a growth could be maintained the brewers felt safe.

The turn of the tide, however, has come and the records in the internal revenue commissioner's office for 1908 bid fair to lose their value as brewery arguments. The slump in the production and sale of fermented liquors began with the closing of the year 1907 and has continued steadily until the March figures show that the average decrease in the amount of liquors brewed is about 7 per cent.—Illinois Issue.

Correspondence on the Religious Life

George A. Campbell.

The Church Atmosphere.

The Correspondent:—"I usually go late to church to avoid the confusion before the service starts. Should we not have a better church atmosphere?"

The church atmosphere is made by the thoughts, words and general attitude of the people. It ought to be such as to calm and to put in a worshipful mood every attendant. It ought to make glad every downcast soul. "I was glad when they said unto me let us go up into the house of the Lord."

The church atmosphere ought to be such as to suggest the comforting Spirit of our religion. "It was too painful for me until I went into the sanctuary of God." The church is erected to the praise of him who is altogether holy. No flippancy, no anger, no gossip, no impatient nervousness, no harsh words and no selfish contending should have place within the sanctuary. As the worshipper enters the building let him offer a prayer to the effect that he may have such thoughts and give forth such expressions as will help to create a sweet spiritual atmosphere, helpful to the praise of God, and strengthening to the heart of man. Those who lead in the various parts of the church work and worship should have no misunderstandings. The very walls can hear. Every nervous word chills the atmosphere. To have unkind or evil thoughts even, in the house of God, is to sin against all the worshippers. Let us all help at every service we attend, in whatsoever church we are, to create an atmosphere of health and not one of poison.

Be cheerful, loving, calm, thoughtful, attentive, hearty and reverent.

Letters That Help.

The Correspondent:—"Dear Bro. Campbell—I should like to have stayed after church this morning to tell you how I enjoyed your sermon, but I feel that your time belongs to the strangers and perhaps you would accept a letter expressing my thanks and appreciation just as well.

"It was a very helpful sermon and I knew I was going to enjoy it when I heard your topic. It is my great desire to live more like Jesus every day. If we could have that love and forgiveness in our hearts that was in Christ's, what a different world this would be; if we could each one realize our individual responsibility to live such a life of love, then would we indeed be a help to one another.

"I think the old custom of the pastor praying for each family of his flock is certainly a kindly one, but I could not help thinking why not each member of his flock pray for their pastor; certainly he he needs the prayers and sympathy, especially in this day and age of unrest and fault-finding. I fear I am very human and must confess I was glad it was my pastor preaching that sermon this morning.

"I trust we will have a largeattendance next Sunday to hear you on Christian union."

The pastor always likes to know the real inner thought of the members. Why should we not open our hearts more to one another? Why should our relationships be marked by such reserve as to keep us from knowing each other? Our association should never be so familiar as to cease to be delicate, but it ought to be open, frank and graciously helpful. Encouragement does us all good. A good letter or a kind appreciative word makes the work lighter, and better, too.

The chief danger to a preacher's spiritual life is not egotism but discouragement. He is in danger of fainting. If he could have frequent supports such as the above letter gives, he would become a far better preacher and a greater force in th kingdom. The expressed appreciation of sermons ought to be far more customary on the part of intelligent church members.

Christian Union

Errett Gates.

Wm. Oeschger, minister of the church at Vincennes, Ind., has the following words of caution concerning "premature attempts at Formal Union" in the Christian Standard:

"It is the writer's prayer and most sincere desire that the Baptists and the Disciples may be united into one organic body. But it will take time. To hurry the time processes that are essential would be to commit an unpardonable blunder."

These are wise and timely words. There are no doubt local Baptist and Christian churches that are not ready for formal union; and there are those that are ready for formal union that ought not to unite because of the hostile attitude of either Baptists or Disciples who have it in their power to create discontent in the united church.

As a matter of theory and congregational usage among Baptists and Disciples, whatever local churches agree to do settles the matter; but as a matter of fact, there is more or less interference from the outside with the affairs of local churches in both bodies.

The greatest danger that confronts Baptist and Christian churches that have agreed to go together is the sectarian spirit that still lingers at large in both bodies. It is to be found not only among lay members, but in ministers, editors, and missionary workers. If this spirit can get to work in time it is able to stir up fears and jealousies between two churches which left alone would have consummated a happy union.

This is how the sectarian spirit is able to do its nefarious work after a union has taken place. Some influential person in either body, fearing that his denomination has lost a point, or genuinely convinced that union between Baptists and Disciples is unadvisable in any event, writes to a leader of the united church and points out the mistake that has been made in making minor concessions, dwells upon it as a "selling out to the other side," or as "a walk-away," and thus arouses jealousy and suspicion. This local leader breathes his suspicion to his friends, and thus a party is formed and a rift made in the united body. This party is there on the lookout for partiality in the minister and has no difficutly in discovering it. "Opposition to him is able at last to force him out; and when the time comes for the election of a new minister the lines are sharply drawn—the Baptists demand a Baptist, the Disciples will have no one but a Disciple. Thus conditions have ripened for division. Thus returns to the united body the sectarian spirit that had been cast out, because it still exists in the form of legion, and is fed and fattened, partly by ignorance and partly by commercialism, in both bodies.

Churches that pioneer the way in this movement for a union between Baptists and Disciples will have to reckon with this sectarian spirit, with all of its disheartening and chilling indifference which often deepens into opposition. All pioneering involves privation, pain and sacrifice. But there is no progress without it. Some one must be the first on new ground. The first man in a new country opens the way for the second; and the second for the third. One or two always lead the way in exploring the wilderness of a new world; they battle with the wild beasts and savage men, and the hostility of untamed nature. No one is ready to go with them, and no one is ready to receive them in the wilds to which they go. Some wish them well, but predict early failure and return. The pioneer is always prematurely on the ground; and birds, beasts, and creeping things let him know it. He disturbs their habits and habitations.

So in pioneering the movement for Christian union; there are plenty of sectarians who have their ideas and plans disturbed, they are bound by their nature to make the pioncers of a new order realize that they have come prematurely. If the pioneer should wait until all his friends and neighbors and the members of his community were ready to make a break for the new world; or if he should wait until all his wild neighbors in the new country were ready for him, he would never go. In such an undertaking it is vain to look for unanimity on the part of all interested persons. In this as in some other things, "the way to resume is to resume."

Dr. Newman Smyth has an article in the Outlook of June 20, on "How to resume church unity," in which he says: "The way to resume church unity is to resume it, as after the Civil War it was said in regard to specie payment, The way to resume is to resume. A date was fixed by Congress for resumption; it was time for it, and it was done. Is not now the practical question before all Christian communions simply this: How shall we prepare to resume our lost church unity? There is indeed, no voice of authority from above to appoint for us a date when the churches shall be one, but by the inward authority of his spirit in the heart of Christianity, is not the Master's word spoken to us, Ye are my friends if ye do this thing which I have commanded you? The only question of obedience left us is, How shall we do it?"

There will always be dangers and risks in the way of doing one's duty, and to many people the presence of danger is sufficient reason for refusing to treat it as a duty. There are dangers attending the reunion of Baptists and Disciples—the danger that one or the other body, or both, shall lose its name; that there shall be coöperation in the saving of the world among those who hold different theological ideas; that there shall be loss of subscribers to some intensely denominational newspapers; that there shall be less talk about great denominational leaders and more talk about Christ; that there shall be less emphasis upon doctrines that divide and more upon service that unites. If these are the dangers, then, Blessed be danger.

CHAPTER VI.

Laddie.

As the spring grew into summer Laddie still lay on his cot in the living-room of the Kirklin home. The house was a typical miner's cottage, with four rooms—a kitchen which answered for dining-room as well, a living-room and two bed-rooms.

The room where Laddie lay was almost destitute of furniture—a coal stove that remained standing through the summer for want of any place to store it, a little center-table on which was a worn Bible, one of the few things to which Maidie had clung through all their poverty, and Laddie's cot, were all. There were two pictures on the wall, one "The Christ Child," the other "The Good Shepherd." These had been given to Jean and Laddie by the Sunday-school teacher. On a shelf draped with tissue paper was a little lamp with a green shade that Jean had given to Laddie last Christmas. Jean had seen it in one of the stores long before Christmas and had made up his mind to get it for Laddie so that he would not be lonesome through the long nights with the little lamp for company.

The pay day before Christmas Jean hoped to receive money instead of a credit slip, and when the time came his feet fairly flew over the ground to the office. He planned to stop at the store on his way home and get the lamp for he was afraid they would all be gone before Tuesday, and Tuesday night was Christmas eve. But alas, poor Jean had only a "bob-tail" check to carry home in place of the little lamp, and he laid his head in his mother's lap and cried out the bitterness of his disappointment. Her heart ached too, for she knew how few pleasures of that kind her children had; but she tried to cheer him up and told him that maybe they could find something for Laddie at the company's store.

Jean's great love for music had secured him a place as organ boy at Grace Church. Nothing gave him more pleasure than to stand by the side of the great organ and hear its melodies, and he said over and over again in his mind that when he got to be a man he would learn to play the organ. On Sunday Mr. Harper, the organist, told Jean to call at his office the next evening. Jean did so, and when Mr. Harper gave him a bright silver dollar he could scarcely wait to thank him before he hastened to the store and bought the little lamp. Laddie's delight at the gift knew no bounds, and he was always glad when the evening came, for his "mither" would come and light his lamp.

There was one other article in the room on which Laddie's eyes rested very often, and that was a little Wedgwood vase that had been the gift of Mrs. Hathaway and which she always kept filled with flowers.

Laddie was wasted almost to a skeleton, but did not suffer much except when a paroxysm of coughing came on. Mrs. Hathaway had brought over some of Evelyn's little white nightgowns for him, and the small white face with its great brown eyes, and the wavy hair which he pushed back so many times a day with his little wasted hand, made a picture that lived for years in the memories of those who knew him.

On Friday morning before Jean went to work Laddie called him to his side and said, "Jean, I won't go to the breaker with you no more."

"Why, Laddie, you will soon be well again and go to work like other boys," said Jean.

"No, Jean, I'm going away. Mrs. Hathaway says when I get over there I can play in the green fields all day and gather God's flowers."

Maidie, who overheard this, thought: "Poor little man! He has never had a chance to play or gather any of life's flowers."

"Jean, I want you to give my little lamp to Lottie. I know she gets lonesome in the long nights, and the lamp will keep her company just like it has me. Oh, Jean, I wish you was going too, for I can't bear to think of you sitting in the breaker every day."

Jean shyly kissed Laddie and crept away; he could not yet realize that his brother must die, but Laddie's words sent a great terror into his heart, and he could scarcely bear to leave him and go to his work.

Just after noon Doctor Jones called and found Laddie weaker and with failing pulse. Maidie looked into the doctor's face with a questioning appeal. The doctor knew her strong, brave heart; he had found many such among the miners' wives; so he called her into the other room and gave her some absent-minded directions about the medicine, until he could gain courage to tell her that she could have Laddie with her only a few more hours. When he told her, Maidie clasped her hands tightly; her lips moved inaudibly as if in prayer, then she turned without a word and went to Laddie's side.

Doctor Jones sent Penny to the mines for Mr. Kirklin and Jean, then went to the parsonage and told Mrs. Hathaway to go over to the Kirklins', for they needed her.

The last rays of the sun shone through the windows of the little cottage and fell across Laddie's cot; the hush of death was in the room, for all felt that the angels were near. Laddie was apparently sleeping with a smile on his face.

"Mither?" and the large eyes opened and searched for the loveliest face he had ever known.

"Yes, Laddie, mither is here."

"Are the blue hills over there?"

"Yes, bairnie."

"And do the lambs play on the hills?" and after a moment, "Will the Good Shepherd carry me all the way? I am so tired." Then, looking towards Mrs. Hathaway, he said so faintly he could scarcely be heard, "Sing—'The Palace o' the King.'" So they sat in the deepening twilight and the sweet voice of the pastor's wife, that had accompanied many to the gates of heaven, sang the old Scotch song:

"Nae nicht shall be in heaven, an' nae desolatin' sea,
And nae tyrant hoofs shall trample i' the city o' the free;
There's an everlasting daylight, an' a never-fadin' spring,
Where the Lamb is a' the glory i' the palace o' the King.
We see oor friends await us ower yonner at his gate;
Then let a' be ready, for ye ken it's gettin' late;
Let oor lamps be brichtly burnin'; let us raise oor voice and sing,
For sune we'll meet to pairt nae mair, i' the palace of the King."

While Mrs. Hathaway sang the last verse Laddie raised his eyes with a far-off look and smiled, and at its close she crossed the little hands and turned to comfort the broken-hearted family.

In the silence of the night Maidie crept to Jean's bedside with the little green lamp in her hand. She looked long at the worn, tired face of her only remaining son as he slept the heavy sleep of exhaustion, then knelt beside him and asked God to spare her this one and to take him out of the coal shadow.

The news spread rapidly. The miners had all known and loved Laddie, and before the whistle blew next morning the Kirklins were made to feel that they were not forgotten in their sorrow.

Carl Schraft hobbled in on his crutches and brought a bunch of pink geraniums that he had tended in his window for many weeks.

Carl had been a breaker boy, but the cramped position in the breaker and exposure to the cold had resulted in rheumatism which had crippled him for life. His white face was deeply lined by long hours of suffering, but his smile was tender and kindly as he gave Mrs. Kirklin the flowers and told her in his broken English that he was sorry.

Old Mrs. Flanagan came over and volubly expressed her sympathy. "It's no flowers I'm havin' for the funeral at all, at all, Mis' Kirklin, but it's me heart that's breakin' for ye, an' I bro't you this pie thinkin' it would be just as good and comfortin' as a bocay." And Mrs. Flanagan produced from the folds of her plaid shawl a flaky pie on a large yellow plate.

A little later Jean was sitting on the back door-step when he heard some stealthy steps coming up behind the board fence at the back of the lot.

"Hi there, Jean." and Jean saw a large white-rimmed eye peering through a knothole, and he knew the eye and voice belonged to Penny.

"Here's a bocay for de fun'ral."

And over the fence popped a big bouquet of flowers and fell beside Jean as a sound of scurrying feet down the alley told him that the donor was gone. He picked up the flowers and tenderly rearranged them. They were white and red phlox interspersed with yellow dahlias, but the odd combination of colors made no impression upon Jean, neither did he see anything peculiar in the manner in which the gift was made; he only felt that Penny had thought of them in their trouble and had done his best to show his sympathy. The stems of the flowers were wrapped in tinfoil that had once been around a package of tobacco, and on a card soiled by finger-prints was written with painful precision, "This is for Laddie, from his true friend, William Penn Crosset."

Evelyn's gift was a bunch of fair, white lilies which Mrs. Kirklin laid beside the face of her dead boy.

After Laddie died Maidie determined to take Jean out of the breaker and send him to the day school. In order to do this she went to work in the mills again, for Hugh's income was not large enough to meet expenses. Jean protested against his mother working in the mills, but she had her way and at last he began school and worked hard at his lessons in the schoolroom all day, then at home far into the night, until Maidie often had to send him to bed.

Long years of hardship had broken down Maidie's health and she soon found that she could not stand the long hours of work in the mills and was finally compelled to give it up. This forced Jean to leave school. With an aching heart she saw him start off to the breaker again with his dinner pail. As she stood in the door and watched him down the street her last hope of giving him the chance for an education for which he so longed vanished, and her brave heart came nearer rebellion than it ever had before.

Church Conditions and Forces in Pittsburgh.

W. A. STANTON.

By Way of Explanation.

To understand Pittsburgh a few things should be said about Pennsylvania. Divide it into three parallel parts running north and south. In the eastern part settled the Quakers and Swedes, in the central the Germans, in the western the Scotch-Irish. Variegate this with a migration from Connecticut into its northeastern corner. Let the population from New York State filtrate the two northern tiers of Pennsylvania counties and make them much like the Empire State. Then know that the southern row of counties was permeated by migration from Virginia and Maryland.

The result was a heterogeneous population, combining phases of all the above classes. Their characteristics prevail unto this day. It is true that they have been toned down, and blended somewhat until the distinctions are not so sharp as they were a century ago, but they still survive.

Pittsburgh is the metropolis of the Scotch-Irish district. From the mountains to Ohio, from West Virginia northward for a hundred miles, conditions are what the Scotch-Irish have made them. The next strongest element to be taken into account is the influence of the Germans who were our nearest neighbors eastward. If one knows the "Pennsylvania Dutch" one knows what that signifies. Coming down to the last score of years there has been a marked incoming of Americans from New England and New York State, and of foreigners from southern and eastern Europe. These two distinct classes of peoples to a degree neutralize each the other's influence and also present a new foreground behind which is still seen the old Scotch-Irish-Teutonic background.

It is important to take the above facts into account in any study of Pittsburgh. Its original population laid the foundations for its great industrialism. Its giants in industry, finance and commerce are still men who were born, or whose parents were born, in Scotland, Ireland, Wales or Germany. Note the family names: Carnegie, Thompson, Jones, Laughlin, Schwab, Corey, Brashear, Frick, Thaw, Guffey, Peacock, Vandergrift, Kuhn, Horne, and Macs without number. To any student of names this list tells an important story. Two or three generations hence it may give way to one with terminals such as "ski" and "vitch." It has already done so on the signboards of the smaller shops and in increasing numbers. The Italian names are also becoming more and more numerous in some important commercial circles. Such is the trend.

All these things have an important bearing on our understanding of the social and religious conditions in Pittsburgh. A bare relation of such facts renders unnecessary the statement of a great many details that every student of municipal life will immediately perceive.

One other thing must be explained. Hereafter what is said by way of contrast will include a period of about twenty years. My personal knowledge covers that time and in an old city (160 years is old in our town) the changes in five or ten years are not clearly marked. But twenty years ago we were two cities, Pittsburgh and Allegheny, with populations of 238,617 and 105,287; a total of 343,904. Now we are one city with a population of 520,322 in 1906 and at a conservative estimate with at least 600,000 today. Pittsburgh is easily the fifth city in the United States at present. For the sake of comparisons and contrasts I shall include both cities in all figures and statements of things a score of years ago, as well as of today when they actually are one municipality.

The Trend of Religious Life.

To some degree this may be inferred from what has been said already. The Scotch-Irish are religious and their religion is of the Presbyterian type in theology and ecclesiasticism. They are conservative, cautious, shrewd, economical but generous, affectionate but reserved, reverent and devout. The religious foundations of Pittsburgh were laid along such lines. In spite of a century and a half, and of our present industrialism, it has not departed from its early traditions. The trend is away from them but the traditions still hold.

Probably in no city of its size in the United States, is the Lord's Day better observed, but the observance is obviously deteriorating. We are free, however, on that day from professional baseball, open places of amusement, manifest commercialism and the open saloon. Comparatively speaking there is little saloon business done on Sunday even on the quiet. Our great iron and steel mills and our morning newspapers are our worst Sunday offenders. Apart from them and in contrast with such cities as Cincinnati, St. Louis and Chicago we are almost Puritanic on Sunday. In contrast with New Orleans and San Francisco we are positively angelic.

When once aroused, public sentiment stands for righteousness to a surprising degree. We are not to be judged as a whole by a few degenerate scions and "heelers" of wealth, nor by an occasional scandal in divorce courts. Such affairs are "news" and advertise the city around the world until false ideas prevail as to our whole population. Unfortunately goodness is not "news" in yellow journalism. Prostitution is here, but it does not flaunt itself before the public and is fairly well restricted to certain down-town localities. Gambling has a hard time with the present administration and "graft" does not begin to flourish in municipal affairs as it did ten years ago. Some trials and convictions have made a deep impression upon the professional politicians with the "open hand." In the matter of lodging and tenement houses, baths, laborers' houses, public playgrounds, parks, cleaner streets, street solicitation by prostitutes, and the scientific organization of public and private charities the trend is all decidedly upward. These may not be things strictly in the sphere of religious life but they have so much to do with it and it is so rooted in them that they must be taken into account.

But there is a struggle going on. As a Scotch-Irish Presbyterian city Pittsburgh's traditions are Calvinistic and it has been said that Calvinism makes for individualism. As America's greatest manufacturing city Pittsburgh today is dominated by the spirit of industrialism and that makes for collectivism. We are in the midst of the strife between these two, the individualism of our past Calvanism and the collectivism of our present industrialism.

Twenty years ago Grant Hill rose above the business district of our city. On and above Grant Hill rose Richardson's magnificent court house and far above its roof rose its splendid campanile, as high as the monument on Bunker Hill, and as fine in its lines, silhouetted against the sky, as the campanile of Venice. Across the street were the two lofty and delicate Gothic towers of the Roman Catholic cathedral, across another street was the spire of Saint Peter's Parish Episcopal Church, around two corners in opposite directions were two other churches. All these made a noble group that stood for justice and religion. Now the churches are all gone, one bought by the county, three bought by one millionaire, and where Saint Peter's stood the purchaser has built a pile some twenty-two stories high. Its highest floor overtops the campanile. It stands between the commerce and industrialism of the city and its law and religion. It is a microcosm of its collectivism. The churches are not destroyed, they have moved farther out, but in a two-fold sense they are not so close to business as once they were. Law and justice are still there but the sky-scraper is higher than their home. The picture is a parable. He who runs may read and know the trend.

Churches and Charities.

Twenty years ago we had 272 church organizations, only eight of which were without meeting-houses. Now there are 436 organizations and a remarkably large number of beautiful and expensive edifices have been built by both old and new churches. I recall that in 1904 there were thirty-four dedications of buildings that collectively cost more than $1,000,000. I can count at least ten large, down-town churches that have sold their properties for great sums of money and have rebuilt in residence parts of the city. The Roman Catholic churches have increased from thirty-eight to sixty, the Protestant churches from 185 to 376.

I have had considerable to say about the Presbyterians because this is the strongest Presbyterian city in our country. The United States census of 1890 proves that. They now have 133 churches, in 1888 they had sixty-one. These figures include Regular, United and Reformed Presbyterians. The first have fifty-one, the second thirty-two, and the third five churches. Only the Reformed Presbyterians are losing ground. During the twenty years one of their organizations merged with a regular Presbyterian church, taking the name of the latter. But their young people are quite apt to forsake the faith and practices of the Covenanters and become "U. P.'s" or just plain "P's." Each of these Presbyterian denominations has a theological seminary here and unitedly they control the Pennsylvania College for Women. As a matter of fact (though not officially) they also control the Western University of Pennsylvania which has just purchased a new campus of about forty acres in the finest residence section of the city and is preparing to spend millions in a magnificent array of buildings. Next to Presbyterians the Methodists are most numerous; including four shades of denominationalism they have grown from forty-one to seventy churches and some of these are very strong. The Lutherans have done well; they had an early start and now number forty-two churches, an increase of twenty-four.

Episcopalians do not have so many churches as some of the other denominations (increase from fourteen to twenty) but five or six of them have large memberships, impressive edifices and parish buildings with more or less endowment, and considerable wealth. One such church (Calvary) has just entered its splendid new plant, built and furnished at a cost of about $550,000; it does a large institutional work in some eighteen or twenty departments and is a blessing in the East End of the city.

Baptists are among the large gainers, having gone from fifteen to thirty-eight churches, from church property worth $236,600 to present property valued at about $1,250,000. Their total income in all their churches in 1888 was $47,580.26; last year it was about $75,000 at a conservative estimate.

The Disciples have increased their churches from four to eleven; the Reformed Church from four to seven, and the Unitarians now have two churches where in 1888 they had none. This last named fact emphasizes an earlier statement as to the incoming of New Englanders as a recent thing. This is also observed in the existence of only five Congregational churches and but two of these are homes of New England Congregationalism. The others are Welsh and this people is a force to be reckoned with here. They have many churches of their own and are to be found in all of our English speaking churches. Christian Science is represented by two organizations, one of which has a good building.

Here is a point of importance. In addition to all this growth within the city limits there is a large and constant growth of both old and new suburban towns. The enlargement of churches already in them, or the organization of new churches is constantly observable. From our city churches there is a constant drain to such suburbs and their churches. As the city church is said to feed upon the country church, so does the suburban church feed upon the city church.

Churches, however, are not the only sources of religious life, influence and activity in this twentieth century. Other organizations must be reckoned with. I am not counting our public institutions and charities but I take into account private ones, especially those that are founded and controlled by the churches. We have six Christian associations for young men and four for young women. The W. C. T. U. has seven organizations; there is an energetic Anti-Saloon League; there are a tract and two Bible societies; there are sixty-two free kindergartens with an enrolment of about 4,000 little folks; there is a splendid system of summer playgrounds under the superintendency of a Baptist woman who once lived in Chicago; there is a milk and ice association that saves the babies and invalids among the poor, both winter and summer; there is a society for the improvement of the poor, and a hospital association, both of which depend largely upon the churches for their support. Ignoring the municipal and state hospitals and institutions, I find 110 hospitals, homes, asylums, nurseries and dispensaries identified with our churches. Places where the churches show their faith by their works.

Add to all these the Salvation Army and the Volunteers of America with their several barracks, the various rescue missions and the splendid Kingsley Settlement House, the summer evangelistic work done in tents on city lots and around the music pavilions of our city parks; add the street preaching of which there is not a little; finally, add the many minor agencies that I have overlooked but that God knows about.

It makes a glorious total and all makes for righteousness. Of course many of these things were here twenty years ago but one would be surprised to know how many were not; some of them not at all, others in much smaller numbers and activities. That number 110, a few lines above, would have been cut down to less than half; there were no free kindergartens until 1893; no summer playgrounds ten years ago; no Kingsley House, no milk and ice association, no Anti-Saloon League, no rescue missions, no preaching in the parks nor in tents, no mission work among Chinese, Italians, Slavonic peoples, Jews, Greeks nor Persians until the last fifteen or eighteen years. Undoubtedly all this is true of some other cities. I know it is true of Pittsburgh.

Church Coöperation.

The Federation of Churches was once officially represented by an organization in Pittsburgh. It never did much and eventually died of inanition. Possibly the fact that the secretary lived in Philadelphia and came to us only once a month and but for a few days explains some things. There was no opposition to the federation, neither was there enthusiasm. Practically we have federated churches, however, and they get together whenever it is necessary. The ministers of the larger denominations have their regular Monday conferences; quarterly they all come together in a union conference that is large. The County Christian Endeavor Union is a live working body; the County Sabbath-school Association has the reputation of being (and statistics proving it) the best organized and most efficient of any county association in the world. The women of all the evangelical denominations have a union missionary society and the superintendents of the Sunday-schools have a large, prosperous and helpful superintendents' union. No American city could have given a warmer welcome and more practical demonstration of sympathetic coöperation irrespective of denominationalism, than were given here to the great March convention of the Young People's International Missionary Movement. Our experience has taught us that the most direct road to coöperation and unity among the churches is in coöperative Bible-school and missionary efforts and in the Christian development of the young people.

I am sure that I have occupied the pulpits of every well known denomination in our city, except the Roman and Greek Catholic churches, and probably a few small bodies represented by only one or two congregations. At least three times I have preached in prominent Protestant Episcopal churches. One of the most congenial clubs I have ever known is at present composed of five Baptists, three Episcopalians, a Congregationalist, four Methodist Episcopalians, two Presbyterians, one Reformed Presbyterian, one Reformed churchman, and three vacancies, the filling of which will depend upon no denominational conditions.

Our Foreign Population.

We have the "foreign problem" and we are not shutting our eyes to it. It is probable that only New York and Chicago contain a larger number of foreigners than Pittsburgh. This is not the place to discuss them and there is only space to say that they are to be found in all parts of our city, in almost all vocations, and that more and more they are changing former conditions. They have great churches, societies, clubs, political and secret organizations, newspapers in their languages, and in some instances they have so monopolized sections of the city as to quite de-Americanize them. The Presbyterians, Baptists, Reformed Church and Methodist Episcopal Church are leaders in work among them, especially among the recent comers from southern and eastern Europe. As a sample: Baptists alone are working among the following nationalities—Hungarians, Croatians, Roumanians, Italians, Swedes, Slovaks and Germans. We have had the privilege of organizing the first Hungarian and the first Slovak Baptist churches in America and of giving to both excellent meeting-houses. Several other denominations are strenuously striving to Americanize and Christianize these multitudes who constitute the "new invasion."

There is coöperation in a part of this work, in its edueational and patriotic phases, by several civic and social clubs and by the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution. The Italians and Slavs add a great problem to those interested in our housing conditions; we had our slums, tenement houses and sweat-shops before they bore down upon us in such multitudes, but not as we have them now. Pittsburgh's typical tenement house is not tall, as it is in New York, but it is packed; it opens on to a vile court or dirty alley; it is unventilated and unsanitary from top to bottom and under the bottom.

What can Christianity do for a man who is one of twenty-four who sleeps in a room twelve by fourteen feet, having in it six beds occupied by twelve during the day and twelve others during the night, its only ventilation being the door and a little window opening into a dirty court? There is a problem.

What can Christianity do for the man who lives in his mansion on the avenue, who owns that tenement house and who neither knows nor cares how his tenants live, so that his agent receives the rent. That is another problem. Pittsburgh has them both.

Finally.

Are we working any great social regeneration? Taking the city as a whole, I confess that indifferentism prevails and religious and social work is done with strain and stress by a minority. In certain sections there are delightful exceptions. Absorbing commercialism, industrialism and pleasure-seeking diminish the workers and make work harder. The ethical and social implications of the gospel of Jesus Christ are not recognized by all who preach and hear that gospel. There never were so many good people in Pittsburgh as now, neither were there ever so many bad people. There never were so many agencies that make for righteousness, neither were there so many that make for evil.

In spots, much success attends individual and organized efforts for moral, social and spiritual betterment, but we have become a city in which things do not easily and naturally tend that way. It is an old saying that "God made the country, man makes the town;" but it is said again, "God showed man how to make the city." Possibly! But man has not always followed his teacher's instructions. He has not in Pittsburgh.

Herbert L. Willett.

Jeremiah seems to have had a longer prophetic career than any other of the spiritual leaders of Israel. He began his work in the earlier part of the reign of Josiah and continued to proclaim his message of warning and rebuke through the declining years of the kingdom of Judah until Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B. C. Even then he did not cease to admonish his countrymen, but held to his task among the panic-stricken refugees who had fled to Egypt to escape the power of the Babylonian conqueror. His ministry lay in the great days of Josiah's reforms, based on the discovery of Deuteronomy in the temple; it continued through the indifferent or hostile reigns of Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, and closed about 577 B. C. in the dark days of the exile. Jeremiah is often called the Martyr Prophet, because he was the victim of almost continuous persecution from the court party who were opposed to his preaching. He insisted that Jerusalem must fall as the penalty of her sins, but that there should be a revival of the nation's life after seventy years. The "New Covenant" should be made with God's people, and the future be bright with the divine presence.

Ezekiel was a young priest who was carried away from Jerusalem to Babylon in the year 597 B. C. ten years before the city fell. He lived during his exile life in a town called Tell-Abib on the Chebar river, probably one of the irrigating canals of the region. Here for twenty-five years (592-567 B. C.) he was the shepherd of the exiles, reproving them for the sins which had brought on their troubles, insisting that Jerusalem must be destroyed and the nation scattered to atone for the past, and then holding before the minds of the community the hope of return and restoration. The last ten chapters of his prophecy are a picture of the rebuilt Jerusalem and its sanctuary.

The city of Jerusalem was taken and dismantled by the Babylonians in 586 B. C. Soon afterward the little prophetic book of Obadiah was written. Its message was one of vengeance upon the Edomites, the people of the region south of the Dead Sea, who had always been the hated enemies of Judah, and made wild demonstrations of joy when the city fell. The prophet insists that the day of retribution shall come for Edom when Jehovah avenges and delivers his people. The date of the book was probably about 575 B. C.

The exile was the period during which the Hebrews who were carried away from Judah by Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon were held in the lands of the east. During a portion of that time Jeremiah was still living, but his work lay at first in Judah and later in Egypt. Ezekiel worked in Babylonia, but his ministry came to an end before the formal period of the exile was half completed. In the closing years of that period a new voice was heard among the communities of exiles in Babylonia. The messages of this unknown prophet are contained in the closing chapters of the Book of Isaiah, beginning with chapter 40. Isaiah of Jerusalem had been dead nearly a century and a half when these words were circulated among the people in exile. The purpose of these messages of what is sometimes called "The Second Isaiah" or "The Evangelical Prophet" was to assure the scattered Hebrews that they should have the opportunity to return to Palestine and rebuild Jerusalem; that it was their duty to undertake this task; that Jehovah their God was far greater than the gods of Babylon, in whom they were often tempted to trust; that Cyrus the Persian would overthrow Babylon and set them free; and that the Servant of God, whom the prophet describes successively as the nation, the righteous remnant and the Messiah, is to succeed in his work for Israel and the world. In these chapters, especially chapter 53, prophecy reaches its highest level.

When Cyrus conquered Babylon in 538 B. C. he issued a decree permitting the captive nations held in the empire to return to their homes. A few of the Hebrews, inspired by prophetic words to undertake the difficult enterprise, made the journey to Palestine and began the work of restoration. Meantime some of the people who had been left in Judah, roused by their leaders, took up the task of rebuilding the temple. Among these leaders were Haggai and Zechariah, two prophets whose messages have been preserved in the books which bear their names. Their addresses were delivered to the people of Jerusalem between the months of September, 520 B. C., and January, 519 B. C. The result of their preaching was to arouse the people to an earnest effort which issued in the completion of the second temple, 516 B. C. It appears that only the first eight chapters of Zechariah belong to this prophet. The remainder of the book deals with other events and a later time.

The little book called "Malachi," which may be the name of its author or may be taken from the text of 3:1 ("my messenger") to serve as a title, probably dates from the period just before the reforms of Nehemiah and Ezra, 445-397 B. C. The prophet charges the people with failure to bring to the temple suitable offerings, and insists that this is the cause of poor crops and general depression. If they do not amend their ways God will send his Messenger to punish and reform them. The promise of this forerunner of the "day of the Lord," this Elijah who is to come, closes the canon of the prophecies as the Jesus arraigned them.

It is apparent, however, that Malachi is not the latest prophetic book of the Old Testament. The Book of Joel falls somewhere in the late Persian period. The date is indefinite, but the occasion is evident. A locust plague has devastated the land. The prophet calls for a solemn fast. Yet he sees that a greater danger is ahead, the great Day of Jehovah. As the result of national humiliation better days are to come, and the Spirit of God is to be poured out upon all the members of the holy nation.

The Book of Jonah is perhaps the last prophetic voice of the Old Testament, and certainly one of the most beautiful. In it the narrow nationalism which held the Jew superior to all others, was rebuked under the form of a parable of prophetic ministry attached to the name of a prophet of the distant past. Jonah was sent to preach a message of repentance to the hated city of Nineveh. He refused to go, and fled in the opposite direction to escape the hateful task. By an experience which may have been intended to represent Israel's strange fate when swallowed up by Babylon, only to be cast forth for a new chance, the prophet is once more set upon the path of duty. To his astonishment and disgust the wicked city repents, and seems about to be saved. He still hopes, however, that it may perish, and while waiting to see its end is taught the great lesson of the love and pity of God, which is not limited to Israel, but extends to all the world. No close of prophecy could be more majestic and inspiring than this.

The Orchard.

The wood is filled with eager calls
And restless twitterings;
Swift feet sweep through its mossy glades,
And crowds of rustling wings,
Till night with trail of sleepy stars
Is led in softly through the bars.

The field, though fair with flowers and sweet
With every wind that blows,
Too glaring is for tired eyes,
With all its gold and rose,
Its brooks that slip like silver chains
Along its daisy-bordered lanes.

Dreams spoil within the garden dim,
Hedged in by hollyhocks;
The highway with its din runs by;
The swallows come in flocks
To twitter on the high brick wall,
While o'er the gate the gossips call.

But in the orchard dim and cool
Is found both balm and rest;
The brown thrush on the pear-bough sings
The peace within his breast
When May days hang their soft pink wreaths,
Or summer through the tall grass breathes.

Here is the freshness of the prime,
Its bowers untouched by blight;
Dews that the noon heat does not drink
Upon its leaves lie light;
Only a far-off reaper's song
And bird notes break the silence long.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON*

Herbert L. Willett.

The Fruits of Jealousy*.

It would seem natural that King Saul, having found so valiant and successful a soldier in David should have counted himself most happy in possessing him. But it was not long before jealousy began its deadly work in his heart. And what can stand before jealousy? The singer of Canticles cries that "jealousy is as cruel as the grave." It knows not how to spare in its desolating sweep. It rises most fiercely against those who have been held in the closest friendship and the tenderest love. It blots out compassion and the memory of all benefits. It rushes on wounding and destroying wherever it goes. Its steps take hold upon death.

Omitted Details.

It seems very strange that the admiration which Saul felt for David at the moment when he returned from the overthrow of the Philistine giant should so quickly cool and turn to hatred. At first glance it looks as if Saul attempted David's life on the very day after victory was gained. But it must be recalled that much is passed over without notice in the record of these events, and only a part of the history is given. Also it becomes apparent upon closer study of the accounts that two narratives of the introduction of David to the court of Saul are woven together in our text. Verses 6-9, 12-16 are taken from the early Judean account of David's career. Verses 10-11 are from a later record. But the union of the two in the manner it occurs brings the assault upon the young armor-bearer too soon after the first act of heroism he had achieved to seem convincing. The recognition of the two sources removes the difficulty.

The welcome extended to the victorious army on its return to the north after the fight on the southern slopes of Judah was the natural and spontaneous expression of popular enthusiasm. The women, who had waited at home for news of the fate of the husbands, brothers and sons, were delighted to celebrate the victory. The two most joyful occasions of an oriental people are spoil, and the merry-making at the harvest time. The women had celebrated the successful crossing of the Red Sea at the time of the exodus from Egypt (Ex. 15:1). The daughter of Jephthah had come forth to greet her father returning from the destruction of Ammon (Jud. 11:34). Deborah and her women sang the song of triumph over Sisera (Jud. 5). So when Saul marched home with the spoil of the Philistines, the women came forth all along the way with their tamborines celebrating with wild joy the success of the hour.

The proverb which they sang, and which became a well-known song of the age (1 Sam. 21:11), would appear to have come from a later part of David's career, when he had taken a larger part in the campaigns of the country. As far as our narrative informs us, he had only performed the one exploit, which would hardly justify the allusions to "ten thousands." But in the rapid movement of our record, which only touches the most essential points, it is possible that the events of years have been compressed into these few lines, and that the song which roused the sleeping anger of the king was the product of later days.

There can be no doubt that the day came, and all too quickly, when the king feared the growing popularity of his young servant. Everywhere David was loved. He conducted himself with discretion, and his handsome appearance and bravery made him a favorite with all alike. The king, thinking to relieve himself of the presence of this too popular soldier, sent him out on dangerous missions, from which David returned victorious and with increased prestige. The people began to talk of him with admiration. His name was upon all lips. Songs composed by the firesides or in the camps of Israel coupled his name with that of the king, and even gave to him superior glory.

This was wormwood and gall to the mind of the king. In earlier days he had been the idol of the nation. They had followed their chief, head and shoulders above them all with admiration and enthusiasm. They had not forgotten that sentiment yet. But a new hero had arisen, and in the rush of their appreciation they forgot how sensitive a leader can be when he sees his reputation in danger. But jealousy burned on in the heart of Saul, and at last found vent in an open attaek upon David.

The verses (10-11), which are inserted from the other narrative, probably belong to the last part of David's life at court. The two notices of such an attack upon him, the one here and the other at 19:9, are probably duplicate accounts of the same event. It is hardly likely that David would have remained with Saul a moment after such an unwarranted act. Be that as it may, the scene is dramatic to the extreme. The king, mad with an insane jealousy, is raving in his house. The word "prophesied" means just that. It does not imply rational utterance in behalf of religion, but the frantic violence to which the prophets so often resorted in their vehement dances and wierd exercises. So Saul acted, and either with deliberate malice or with sudden and uncontrolled fury hurled his javelin at the young man standing near. That David was attempting to sooth him with his music was no help. The king was mad with anger and brooding jealousy, and David's life was in deadly peril. How easily, but for that Providence which orders events in mysterious harmony with His will, might the life of Israel's greatest warrior of the early age have been cut down, and the light of the nation quenched.

The Breach With David.

The event must have taught David his peril, and hastened his departure from the little court of Saul. Very soon we find him roused on the very night of his marriage to the king's daughter, to seek protection among his own clan in the south. Saul had driven from his side the man who could have done more than all others to sustain the tottering throne. Henceforth there could be only increasing distance between the two. Saul must decrease and David increase. Dail Readings. M., David's enemy, 1 Sam. 18:1-16; T., David in danger, 1 Sam. 19:1-10; W., David and Samuel, 1 Sam. 19:18-24; T., Envy forbidden, Rom. 13:8-14; F., Evil of envy, Jas. 4:1-12; S., Freedom from envy, 1 Cor. 13:1-15; S., Mercy to the believer, Isa. 26:1-11.

Silas Jones.

I suppose that every sin known to man has been committed in the name of religion. Cruelty, violence, deceit, fraud, envy, murder, fratricide, and blasphemy have been justified on the ground that they were for the greater glory of God. If one is astonished and perplexed that religious sanction should be sought for foul deeds he will have to seek relief in a study of the ideas of religion that have been and are accepted as true. The thug had a religious reason for murder, the Spanish Inquisition had in its service men who sincerely believed they were doing the will of God when they tortured heretics and those suspected of heresy. The wrongs that are today committed by church members are not necessarily the fruits of hypocrisy; they may be due to mistaken notions of what God requires. Some abstract doctrine exalted above its merit will often be found to explain seemingly conscienceless conduct. We all need to ask ourselves frequently what is central in religion and to form the habit of testing our lives by this central truth, rather than by inferences from it.

Justice.

Does the Czar of Russia think he is just to his subjects? He probably does. But can a despot know what justice is? It is to be be doubted that he can. The death rate among children in Moscow is three times that of London or Paris. The people have something to say about their rights in England and in France; in Russia they are told what they must do and what they may have, by the agents of the autocrat. When Moscow governs itself, the death rate will be much lower. The bigotry and inhumanity that have marched under the banner of Christianity have their explanation in religious despotism of one sort or another. The ecclesiastical or dogmatic autocrat is ignorant of the needs of his subjects. He forbids them to think and act as they must think and act if they are true to themselves. Democracy in religion is as necessary as democracy in government. We are just to men when we think with them, not when we think for them.

Kindness.

It is all very well to remind ourselves of the kindness that moves the surgeon to inflict pain in order to remove disease. Painful operations are frequently required to remove diseases of the affections and of the will. It is the part of wisdom to submit to moral surgery when a serious malady threatens the moral life. But let kindness be kindness and not irritability. We may often try to correct our neighbor, not because he is wrong, but because his opinion is disagreeable to us. We are not always in sympathy with him when we say we are. We do not like him and consequently we are anxious to condemn every opinion he holds. It is positively distressing to discover that he is in accord with us in certain beliefs, for we take pleasure in calling his attention to his stupidity and perversity. We must come back to our principle of democracy again. We must feel with men. Amid all the differences of race and tradition, there is a common human element, about which the friendly feelings can gather.

Humility.

Coarseness and dullness favor pride. The proud woman imagines that she belongs to a higher order of being than that of the woman in the slums. But the germ from the crowded, filthy quarters of the poor destroys her child, and the proud woman, if she is intelligent, sees that, after all, she is not far removed from her poorer sister. Weakness is characteristic of all that is human. The limitations of thought are painfully evident to the greatest mind. The saint must daily confess his sins. The philosopher Kant spoke for all noble minds and hearts when he said that two things filled him with increasing awe: the starry heavens above and the moral law within. The wisest has made but a beginning in knowledge and the holiest man is taking his first steps in goodness. We shall not outgrow our feeling of humility unless we outgrow common sense and the desire to do right.

Christian Endeavor Lesson.

A SEA SCHOOL.

It is impossible to sail on the sea or spend our time by its boundless shore without being impressed with the thought that there is a divine and mighty Hand controlling this wonderful expanse.

In the early morning, at noonday, and at even-tide when all is calm, the waves seem to whisper, "God is good."

In the tempest, when man realizes his weakness and helplessness, then we hear the mighty billows thundering in deep-toned voice, "The Lord, He is God."

As we consider the sea, His handiwork, we get a clearer vision of God; of His grace in the calm, His power in the storm, and, in the rising and falling tide, so gentle and yet so ceaseless, His love and mercy, which is deeper, broader and more wonderful and sure than the tide.

God commands the waves, and they obey His will. He stirs the deep from a calm to a mighty activity.

It is the same almighty Father who commands Christian Endeavorers everywhere to "go up and possess the land."

Now, therefore, we are ambassadors for Christ, on the King's business, and therefore must hasten.

Truly He is calling us to great and glorious activities, and we should study to do His will even as the winds and the sea obey Him.—S. E. Sisco in C. E. World.

Save the Pieces!

By Charles Frederic Goss, D. D.

Little Betty had never attended a school of pedagogy, but she was a most accomplished teacher, all the same.

One of her finest lessons was indelibly stamped on her mother's mind in the following very original manner:

She had a bisque dolly by the name of Mopsy, which she loved with a devotion too deep for words. But one daq, horrible to relate, she dropped her on a hardwood floor! Of course there was nothing left of her lovely head but a mass of unrecognizable fragments, and as the puppy came along at that very instant and tore her body limb from limb, the poor simulacrum was not one whit better off than as if it had gone through a sausage mill or a threshing machine.

Betty was stunned. She imitated the example of Rachel and wept, refusing to be comforted.

But, thank God, the sorrows of childhood are as brief as they are bitter. After her grief had spent itself, she gathered up the fragments, seeking them with a care that reminded me of Milton's description of "the sad friends of Truth," who, after she had been hewed into a thousand pieces and scattered to the four winds, imitated the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, and went up and down gathering up limb by limb still as they could find them."

All the most important portions of the shattered anatomy having been recovered, little Betty carried these confused fragmens in her arms, and sang to them as lovingly as if they still retained their identity. They were much harder to handle, however, than in their entirety, and she kept dropping them on the floor until her mother, seeing her troubles and touched by her devotion, gave her a little basket, in which she put them all very tenderly, and afterward fed them and washed them and put them to bed with no apparent idea that a doll in a thousand pieces was any less a real doll than when knit together and compacted into a single organism.

At first her mother smiled, and then she grew sober and finally cried—for a sort of parable or allegory began to take shape before the eye of her mind.

"The darling!" she said to herself. "See how she values fragments! When my treasures break it's little enough comfort I get out of the pieces. I must have the whole of things or nothing. One after another my castles in the air have fallen to the ground and broken, and I have utterly despised their ruins. Because life has not been altogether what I dreamed, I have rejected with contempt what little portions of it have been rescued from the debris. But look at little Betty! Profound philosppher, sublime savant! A tiny fragment is better than nothing. A basket of pieces has some value, even though the original whole has disappeared. I'll save the pieces after this. I'll gather up the fragments into baskets. A half loaf is better than no loaf at all.

She rushed up to the top of the staircase where Betty sat singing her fractional babe to sleep, took her in her arms, kissed her, called her sweetheart, darling, teacher, guide, and a score of other beautiful names.

Save your pieces!

It's an old and true saying that any whole is a little more than equal to the sum of all its parts. After Humpty Dumpty has fallen, all the king's horses and all the king's men cannot put Humpty Dumpty together again. Of course your hopes have been dashed. Of course your plans have been shattered. Of course your existence has lost its completeness. But, child, are there no values in the fragments? Pick them up. Restore them to their original shape as nearly as possible; or, if they are incapable of restoration, put them in a basket. Your family circle has been broken? Well, one is gone, or two or three, but there are some left. Your fortune has been dissipated? Yes, but gather up the fragments and start again. Your health has been shattered? True, but one lung or one leg is better than none.

Then—save the pieces!—Sunday School Times.

SUNDAY SCHOOL PLANS IN EL PASO, TEXAS.

Five took membership with the congregation Sunday and two the Sunday before.

The ideal of Bible School teaching is being raised in the city. The Christian Church has a training class with an enrollment of fifty. The superintendents of the schools of the city are offering at the Y. M. C. A. a course in pedagogy in connection with the current lessons, which every teacher is required or urged to take. The plan is this, a head teacher teaches ten teachers who teach all the other teachers in groups according to the grade of pupils they teach. A bibliography of the best books is supplied through the public library. Already good results are seen.

Anything that will help the R. R. Telegraph operator to keep a clear head and steady nerves is of interest to operators particularly and to the public generally.

As the waste of brain and nerve cells in active work of this kind is great, it is important that the right kind of food be regularly used to repair the waste.

"I have used Grape-Nuts," writes a B. R. & P. operator, "for the past six or eight years, daily, buying it by the dozen pkgs.

"A friend of mine, a doctor, who had been treating me for stomach trouble and nervous exhaustion, recommended me to leave off so much meat and use fruit and vegetables, with Grape-Nuts as the cereal part of each meal.

"I did so with fine results and have continued Grape-Nuts from that time to the present. I find in my work as R. R. Telegrapher that I can do more work and far easier than I ever could on the old diet.

FROM NEW ORLEANS.

As chairman of the Dixie Welcome committee, to which has been assigned the pleasant duty of extending a regular old-fashioned Southern welcome to all delegates and others who attend the great International Christian Missionary convention of the Churches of Christ to be held in New Orleans from October 9 to 15, I want to request a little space in your valuable publication to extend in advance an invitation and a welcome, and to urge every pastor, every elder, every deacon, and every church member, every Sunday school superintendent, teacher and pupil to come to New Orleans in October and help us make the 1908 convention the greatest gathering of the Disciples of Christ ever held in this country.

This is what we are all working for, and it is what we intend to have—the greatest convention in the history of our churches. And too many cannot possibly come. There will be welcome enough to go around, no matter how vast the attendance. The more the better and the greater your welcome. Hundreds are already p'anning to come and we want you (Brother and Sister Reader of this communication) to understand that this is a personal invitation to you, and that a personal welcome will be extended to you; and that by coming you, your family and your church will be benefitted in every possible respect.

A trip to New Orleans! The very thought is full of enthusiasm. Do you realize what it means, aside from the convention? That, of course, is the paramount issue, and that is what you want to come for, primarily; but there will be ample time for each and every visitor to enjoy the many, many points of interest in this quaint old southern city, abounding in history and romance.

Who could fail to enjoy a trip through the picturesque old French and Spanish portion of the city, "Le vieux Carre," dating back to the days of old? One might spend days and weeks in this interesting section of New Orleans, and still find much that is of great interest; although in a few hours' time many interesting points may be visited, such as the old St. Louis cathedral, which as a church site dates back to 1718; the Cabildo (1795) wherein the early governors administered the affairs of the province, and in which was signed the transfer of Louisiana from France to the United States; the famous old "Place d'Arms" (now Jackson square), where the French and Spanish soldiers were accustomed to parade and drill; the Pontalba building, erected as residences for the grandees and their families; the world famed French market; the Bank of Louisiana, established in 1804; "Old Haunted House" of Mme. Lalaurie; rendezvous of the Pirate Lafitte; the lugger landing, at which the oyster luggers discharge their cargoes; the old Spanish arsenal of the ancient Spanish barracks; the famous old Hotel Royal, so full of ante-bellum recollections, and many other places of great interest to the visitor, too numerous to mention.

Aside from the historical points, there are many other places which you will find it to your interest to visit, and which will make your trip well worth while, such as the United States mint; Jackson Barracks where the coast artillery assigned to the defense of the Mississippi is located; the Cotton Exchange which controls to a large extent the movement of the south's greatest staple; the Sugar Exchange; the great river front with its miles of fine docks and wharves, lined with ocean steamers, as well as the big Mississippi steamboats; the largest sugar refinery in the world; Chalmette, the site of the battle of Orleans; quaint curio and antique stores; the beautiful public parks, unexcelled anywhere in this country; West End, Spanish Fort and Milenberg, pleasure resorts located on Lake Pontchartrain; and last, but by no means least, the finest cafes in America.

Who does not enjoy a good meal? Ask the blase globetrotter, he who has covered the entire world in his travels, who has feasted in the cafes of Europe, tried the banquets of the Orient, partaken of the frugal repast of the Alaskan and the spreads of tropical dainties: "Where, in all your journeys, did you find the most delicious cooking?" And nine times out of ten, whether he be an epicure or a gourmand, or simply a man with a healthy appetite and who knows what is good, the answer will be "In New Orleans!" Here will be found every delicacy you can wish, prepared in any style desired, genuine Creole cooking cuisine a la Francais, a la Allemande or a la Italienne, quaint and interesting cafes, modern and handsome restaurants; with service par excellence.

And with it all a hearty southern welcome! Who can resist it? Surely not those who have once partaken of New Orleans hospitality; and to those who have not been so fortunate, let me give a word of advice: Don't, by any means, miss this opportunity to visit the Crescent City, metropolis of the south, the Paris of America!

Jas. L. Wright,
Chairman Dixie Welcome Committee.

MORE TIME FOR SLEEP.

Want of sufficient sleep is a potent cause of irritability, inaccuracy of work, nervous disturbance and breakdown. This was the undisputed verdict of physicians at the recent meeting of the British Medical Association at York, England. Young children, they said, by want of sufficient sleep often lay the foundation for nervous diseases which tax the skill of physicians in after years. Dr. T. D. Acland said that mental and bodily inefficiency of school children was caused by over-pressure and deficient sleep, which produces similar effects to the tobacco habit. Of twenty-nine experts connected with public schools, eleven named ten hours as the minimum time for pupils to sleep, fourteen named nine to ten and one-half hours, and four thought nine hours might suffice. It was agreed that adults who work need more sleep than did those of the last generation, because they live at a faster pace. Hard play does not recuperate for hard work. Exercise taken from time required for sleep exacts double reparation. Old people may retain their vigor long by taking a nap after luncheon, or whenever they are so disposed. "No harm," said an eminent practitioner, "is likely to follow in these strenuous days from the advice to take as much sleep as is desired."—Ex.

Let no entangling sins ensnare
And drag me down to black despair.

Defiled by sin's unholy touch,
And fast in Satan's venomed clutch,
I cry to Grace to rescue me:
Stretch out thine hand and set me free!

SHE TOLD IT TO HER CARD CLUB.

The little lad who was the joy of the household had been regularly to Sunday school. He had caught some ideas from the lessons to which he listened, and was struggling to relate them to his own life and its environment. Doubtless he had thought frequently of problems which big folks imagine boys never face.

In serious mood he came to his mother one day.

"Mamma, were you on earth when Jesus was here?"

"Why no, of course not, laddie. What ever put that idea into your head?" And she proudly caressed the sober face.

"Well, did you ever see Jesus?" he persisted.

"No, I never saw Him as people did who lived then."

After a time the questions continued: "Is Jesus ever coming again, mamma?" he queried.

"Yes, I think so."

WONDERED WHY.

Found the Answer Was "Coffee."

Many pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much flesh and often wondered why I was always so pale, thin and weak.

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life.

"During this time I was drinking coffee, didn't think I could do without it.

"After awhile I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. I didn't like the taste of it at first, but when it was made right—boiled until dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it.

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My sick headaches were less frequent, and within five months I looked and felt like a new being, headache spells entirely gone.

"My health continued to improve and today I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

"There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

"And if He comes, will you be glad to see Him?" said the boy.

"Yes, we shall all be glad to see Him."

Again the little questioner is absorbed in meditation. He is engaged in the disturbing and difficult task of relating conduct to profession. Where they fail to match, who shall say he is too young to understand the meaning of deficiency in conduct. How oft are men judged by "their large professions and their little deeds"!

Almost relentlessly the unconscious child pursues the mother. "If Jesus should come to our house, would you stay at home to meet Him?"

"Of course," she answered abruptly.

"But, mamma, suppose He should come on the day your card-club meets, would you stay at home to see Jesus?"

Not only is it true that "a little child shall lead them," but often does a child lay bare the predominant passion of a parent's life. Stripped of all disguises it stands out in all its naked ugliness and pretense. Then men and women would gladly conceal its hypocrisy and silence the messenger whose surgeon-hand laid open the disease within. We forgive the child his innocent frankness when we might be tempted to carry a hostile spirit toward the one who was older. Thank God for these sweet, keen, and kind messengers who come to measure and bless our lives.

The mother immediately began to see what had first place in her life. In theory and sentiment Jesus Christ was Lord and King. In practice He received the fag-end of her time and ability. Before the members of her card-club the next day she confessed that nothing had so stirred her conscience as the child's straight question. Was it worth while, this passionate rush for pleasure? Was there no other employment, helpful to humanity, that would yield a day's pay of satisfaction? Could she justify the use of her energy to please herself alone? Liberty to do as she pleased was obligation to do as she ought. Christ pleased not Himself. A great vision of larger service came to this card-engrossed mother.

Would God the vision splendid might come to many another life, rich in power but dissipated in practice! The Christian stewardship of leisure is as high and holy a duty as the stewardship of wealth. "Time is the stuff that life is made of," and life is the index of destiny. Who dares to spend the forces of eternity upon the transient phantoms of time?—Selected.

Conversion is not a one-time event, but an all time process.

VALUE OF LABOR-SAVING DEVICES.

When McCormick built his first hundred reapers in 1845, he paid four and a half cents for bolts. That was in the mythical age of hand labor. Today fifty bolts are made for a cent. So with guard-fingers: McCormick paid twenty-four cents each when James K. Polk was in the White House. Now there is a ferocious machine which with the least possible assistance from one man cuts out thirteen hundred guard-fingers in ten hours, at a labor cost of one cent for six. Also, while exploring one of the Chicago factories, I came upon a herd of cud-chewing machines that were crunching out chain-links at the rate of 56,000,000 a year. Near by were four smaller and more irritable automata, which were biting off pieces of wire, and chewing them into linchpins at a speed of 400,000 bites a day.

"Take out your watch, and time this man," said Superintendent Brooks of the McCormick plant. "See how long he is in boring five holes in that great casting."

"Exactly six minutes," I answered.

"Well, that's progress," observed Brooks. "Before we bought that machine, it was a matter of four hours to bore those holes."

In one of its five twine-mills—a monstrous Bedlam of noise and a wilderness of fuzz, which is by far the largest of its sort in the world—there is enough twine twisted in a single day to make a girdle around the earth.—Everybody's Magazine.

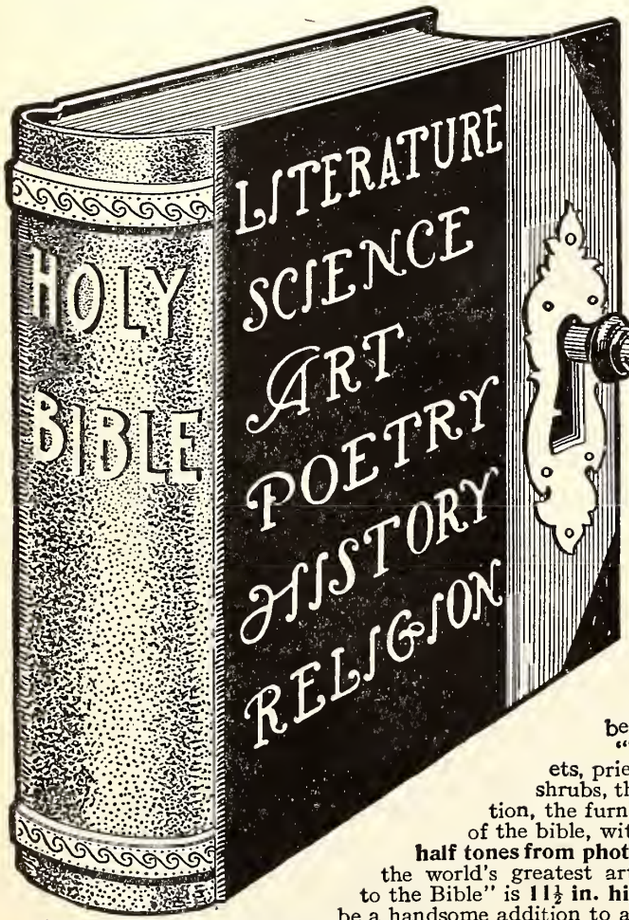
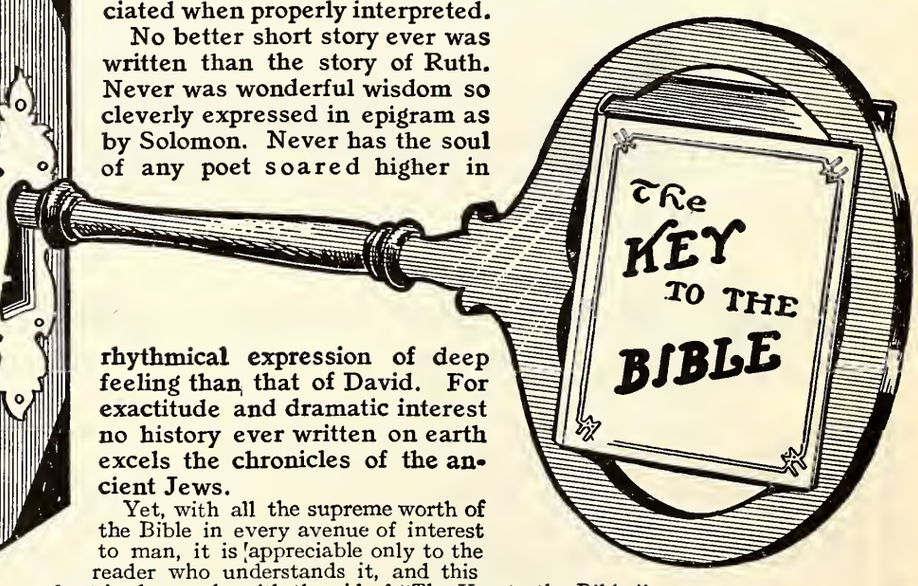
THIS MONTH ONLY---The Key to the Bible, advertised below, together with the Christian Century to a new subscriber for 6 months for Only Two Dollars.

The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.



Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples, houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the Preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

I enclose $3.00 for one copy of "The Key to the Bible" to be sent prepaid.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

MRS. OLIPHANT'S LAST LINES.

On the edge of the world I lie, I lie,
Happy and dying, and dazed and poor,
Looking up from the vast great floor
Of the infinite world that rises above
To God, and to Faith, and to Love, Love, Love!
What words have I to that world to speak,
Old and weary, and dazed and weak,
From the very low to the very high?
Only this—and this is all:
From the fresh green sod to the wide blue sky,
From Greatness to Weariness, Life to Death.
One God have we on whom to call;
One great bond from which none can fall;
Love below, which is life and breath,
And Love above which sustaineth all.

JUDGE CHARLES J. SCOFIELD

Altar Stairs

By JUDGE, CHARLES J. SCOFIELD, Author of A Subtle Adversary. Square 12mo., cloth. Beautifully designed cover, back and side title stamped in gold. Illustrated, $1.20.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

The story will not only entertain all readers, but will also impart many valuable moral lessons. This is an age of story reading and the attention of the young especially, should be called to such books of fiction as "Altar Stairs."

W. G. WALTERS, Bluefield, W. Va.

If one begins this story, he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. Its fascination holds the reader's attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished. Read what the reviewers say.

More of such books are needed just now among those who are pleading the restoration of Apostolic Christianity.

JAMES C. CREEL,
Plattsburg, Mo.

It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of the truer life, possible only to him who has tarried praverfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher.

EDITORIAL

Theology and the Sea Serpent.

In a recent number of a lively illustrated weekly there is an editorial statement to the effect that in this season of the year, during the dog days, between the activity of the national conventions and the fiery zeal of the campaigns, there is a lull in affairs which is most trying to the editors of the daily newspapers. News is difficult to get. Nothing exciting is happening. It is in such a time that editorial ingenuity and reportorial diligence seek material for the entertainment of a weary and jaded public in the realm of theological novelty or in the discovery of the sea serpent. In neither direction is it necessary to abide very close to facts, and he is a poor reporter who cannot secure the basis for a thriller in the utterances of some preacher or teacher. Equally inefficient is the editor who cannot supply sufficient scare heads to complete the story to the satisfaction of a public waiting to be shocked.

All this is so well known that few people are willing to credit what they read in the daily papers regarding public men and their utterances. It is a part of the penalty a nation pays for the priceless boon of a free press that most things printed must be taken with a large allowance for exaggeration or deliberate misrepresentation. Especially is this the case when a daily paper is reporting the statements of men who are speaking upon questions of biblical or theological interest. It is well known by the newspaper men that in order to have newspaper value a man's speech upon the Bible or Christian truth must "attack" something or somebody. Men cannot be conceived as differing in their views upon the great questions of our faith without "attacking" each other. It makes the statement of the case much more dramatic and interesting to put it in this way.

Point is given to such reflections by the fact that the daily press of this city has been sending out considerable sensational material during the past few days regarding the utterances of Professor Willett on the subject "Types of Old Testament Narrative." These lectures were delivered on four successive days at the University in the list of open lectures for the summer quarter. They dealt with Old Testament myth, tradition, miracle and fiction. Their thesis was that in addition to the ordinary records and messages of the Old Testament, comprising almost the entire body of its teachings, there are four types of narrative which differ in character from this central body of the record. These are the least important portions of the Hebrew Scriptures, yet they have attracted large attention and are the subject of constant comment when the value and purpose of the Old Testament are called in question. There are people who seem to imagine that because the Bible makes use of familiar Semitic myths for purposes of illustration, or relates marvels of some of its heroes such as our generation finds it difficult to credit, or uses fable and parable to enforce its teaching, therefore it is discredited as a book of religious messages.

The use of myth in the Old Testament is easily verified. The conflict of Marduk with Tiamat, the dragon of chaos and darkness, is a Babylonian myth which is often referred to in the older Scriptures. References to Leviathan, Rahab, the dragon beneath the sea and the like are well known to Bible students. But the most apparent relationship between the Babylonian myth and the Old Testament is in the narratives of creation, which are seen to resemble very closely the accounts of the older civilization, though with the elimination of the polytheism which is so marked in the original form. It would be strange if these world-stories of the Semitic race found no echo in the Old Testament. Yet their use is but incidental. They are but vehicles for the truths which the prophets were concerned to teach.

The miracles of the Old Testament differ both in character and significance from those of the New. The latter are authenticated by the character of Jesus, while the earlier narratives have no such credentials, and must be considered apart from such guarantees. They fall, when so considered, into several classes. There are those which manifestly rest upon fact, as the events connected with the exodus, the healing of the sick and the predictive element in prophecy. Some are based upon figures of speech, as in the Song of Deborah, or are quotations from poetical descriptions of natural events, like the statement of the Book of Jasher regarding Joshua's prayer for a lengthened day. Others were probably legendary, such as the story of the man brought to life by touching the bones of Elisha, or the deliverance of Jonah by the great fish. Still others are not only improbable, but unethical, such as the destruction of the children of Bethel by the bears, following the curse of Elisha, and the destruction of the bands of soldiers sent to arrest Elijah. Yet the entire miracle material of the Old Testament, which is mostly grouped about the characters of Moses and Elijah, is but small and unimportant beside the impressive truths which even these prophets affirmed, to say nothing of the great prophetic workers who used no miracle. Not all these narratives are useful for religious instruction today, but those which lack the values for which the teacher, the parent and the preacher are looking are few and unimportant beside those which minister to ethical and spiritual life.

The Old Testament also contains examples of fiction used for instruction in morals or for national warnings and inspiration. The parables of Jesus are the immortal example of works of the imagination used for the highest purposes. In the Old Testament there are fables, such as Jotham's description of the trees going forth to choose a king, and the rebuke of Jehoash to Amaziah. There are parables, like those of Nathan to David and that of the wise woman of Tekoah. There are great national figures, such as those used by Ezekiel in the story of the eagle, the two profligate sisters and the valley of dry bones. And there are a few books which fall into the same class as works of the imagination, such as Job, Esther and Jonah, which use either known or unknown figures in the life of the nation to point the teachings which they seek to make emphatic. Yet here again the total material of this class is very small when compared with the mass of Old Testament narrative and preaching.

Such were the arguments of the lectures. Their purpose was constantly announced as showing that while the Old Testament contains the types of narrative which any other primitive literature possesses, its use of material is always subordinated to its ethical and religious purposes. That the presence of these elements which were once mistakenly denied to it, on the supposition that it was all literal history, not only do not impair, but increase its value as a book of instruction wrought out by the Spirit of God working through holy men of that race chosen to be the prophet nation of the world. It was insisted that it would be strange if the Bible alone were inhibited from the use of those forms of narrative which have been found of the highest value in all literatures which tend to promote the higher life. It was insisted that miracles must not be regarded as an arbitrary fracturing of the laws of nature, which are simply God's ways of working, but the use of such laws at a higher level than our imperfect lives permit, and that even scientific experiments are proving that the belief in miracle is not to be set aside without consideration.

The daily press of Chicago at once blossomed forth with the most alarming reports of what had been said. The Bible had been attacked. Miracle was denied. No man ever worked a miracle. The Bible was fragmentary, imperfect, inartistic, unreliable. A storm of protest had been raised by the lectures. Great excitement prevailed. All of which was in no manner even suggested by the facts. Reporters were given exact and careful statements of the matters presented in the lectures, only to have the reports repeated in the most extravagant form, with still worse scare heads supplied by office editors. When the attention of these gentlemen was called to the injustice and injury wrought by such alleged "news" they frankly stated that the lectures as they were actually delivered would be worthless as "news." Nobody cared to read that a teacher had declared the Bible to be the world's greatest book, its contents inspired and its narratives in almost their total extent matters of fact and the remainder equally valuable for the purposes employed. And so the ends of truth are sacrificed to the expediencies of daily journalism in the silly season when the only sensation that can arouse a listless community is a scare head on theology or a story about the discovery of the sea serpent.

One correspondent writes, "Why do you not state the facts in the same journals that have so misrepresented them?" Have our friends ever tried the experiment? You send in an explicit denial of the truthfulness of a published story, and it appears, days later, reduced to a tenth of its size, in an obscure corner of the paper. Meantime the original perversion of facts has appeared under scare heads, and been copied in every journal in the land. Or you summon a reporter from the offending paper and ask him to feature your actual statement. The next day there appears a reiteration of all the most offensive things already put into your mouth, with the startling heading, "Professor So-and-So defends his attack upon the Bible."

The satisfaction left to one thus featured in the public prints is the privilege of knowing that a great company of those who read such accounts assess them at their true worth; that a large number of others write for the facts and welcome an explanation; and that those to whom he actually addresses himself, his students and the public who make up his audiences, are helped over difficulties of which they had asked explanation, and are assisted to find in the Holy Scriptures, both Old and New, the Word of God, written aforetime for our admonition by holy men who spoke as they were moved by the Divine Spirit.

Christian Union

Errett Gates.

The movement for the union of Baptists and Disciples in Northwestern Canada, has received a very serious set-back in the dissolution of the union at Portage La Prairie. This was the largest and most representative society of Baptists and Disciples to come together, which makes this event very regrettable because of the discouraging influence that it will have upon other unions. I say regrettable. It will be regretted by those Baptists and Disciples who believe in Christian union and see in it the coming of the kingdom of God and the speedier conversion of the world to Christ, but it will not be regretted by those who love their denomination with its name, its history, and its doctrines and usages, more than they long for the progress of Christianity in all the earth.

A letter has come to the writer from one who knows all the facts in the case, containing the following statements concerning the separation: "Yes, the Disciples are back again in their own church. They had a great meeting at the close. Romig and Wright, of Cincinnati, were there; also two or three Baptist ministers. All the Disciples voted in favor of continuing the union according to the terms on which they united. All the Baptists voted that the union be dissolved. An article in the Portage paper said the union was dissolved on account of important doctrinal differences."

The letter contains other statements throwing light upon the local conditions and the more or less discreditable human motives that led to the division. According to this letter there were some Disciples and some Baptists who acted as if they were possessed by anything but the spirit of Christ, and desired the triumph of their denominational doctrines and usages more than they desired the answer of Christ's prayer for unity. Two or three thoroughly indoctrinated zealots who imagine that the preservation of correct doctrine and ceremony are more important than the preservation of the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," are able to disturb the peace of a united church and make fellowship with them simply intolerable. Not all of the Baptists and Disciples in the Portage church were of this sort; but some were, and they were the stones of offence on which the union was broken. They were unable to forget that they were either Baptists or Disciples.

One of the most serious hindrances in the present effort to bring Baptists and Disciples into closer relations is the fact that the Baptists who go into these unions receive little or no encouragement from their own official leaders and newspapers. They have very much to say against union and very little to say in favor of it. It can safely be said that the general attitude of the Baptist press is against union. The result is that Baptists who go into unions without reckoning with this wide-spread denominational opposition soon face a kind of ostracism from Baptist fellowship.

It was the influence of outside leaders among the Baptists, who have decided against union with the Disciples in any event, that led to the failure of the union negotiations at Rockford, Ill. No matter how desirable union at Rockford might seem to the local Baptist and Christian societies, an outside "Missionary Committee" is able to pass on the merits of the case and say to Rockford Baptists, "Don't do it." The action of the Baptist people and pastor of Rockford, in view of the "supplemental report" was most wise, in declining union with the Christian Church. Not only because of the evenness of the vote for and against the union in the Baptist Church itself, but because of the attitude of the Rock River Baptist Association. The principle of fellowship among Baptist churches is too strong to be disregarded by a local Baptist Church and pastor.

As illustrating the general tenor of opinion as expressed in Baptist newspapers the following extracts of correspondence are taken from the Baptist Standard of Chicago:

"Union between churches of different denominations can be based only upon consistent integrity to honest convictions and purposes. It can never be found in mere conformity to the same name. This matter of a name is one of the articles which the Disciples insist on with uncompromising firmness. Is the name Baptist become so obnoxious that we must cast it away?"

It seems that there are some Baptists who steadily misunderstand the position of the Disciples on this question of name. In any union between Baptists and Disciples there must be a name for the united church. If the Disciples should not insist on the Baptists taking their name, neither should the Baptists insist on the Disciples taking their name. The Disciples simply ask that the question of name be referred to New Testament usage for settlement. Any name by which the followers of Christ may be properly distinguished from any other religious leader will suit the Disciples. It is not that the name Baptist is not a good denominational name, just as good as the name Methodist or Presbyterian, or that the Disciples entertain any peculiar antipathy toward the name; but simply that it does not properly describe the people to whom it is applied. It is not a good name even for Baptists for they are more than Baptists, and it is just as good a name for Disciples, for they are no less Baptist than the Baptists. But both Baptists and Disciples are more than Baptists, they are followers of Christ, and any name by which the followers of Christ can be designated without making them something more, or something less, or something else, will suit the Disciples, and certainly ought to satisfy the Baptists unless they are peculiarly enamored of that strangely misrepresentative name. There are such names not appropriated by either body. The Disciples are ready to join with the Baptists in being called "Church of God," or "Church of Christ," or simply "The Church," or any other name than identifies them with Christ, without separating them from any of His people.

The same writer says: "The majority of Baptists hold to what they believe, and we think rightly believe, to be fundamental principles of New Testament Christianity. From these beliefs they will not depart."

That is just the reason why some Disciples feel that the two bodies ought to get together. Both are "New Testament people." The Disciples also "hold to what they believe to be fundamental principles of New Testament Christianity," and they are glad to find the Baptists a people willing to be tried as to faith and practice by the New Testament. That is one reason why the Disciples feel that it should be so easy for the Baptists to give up their name. It is not a name by which the followers of Christ are designated in the New Testament. That name would be more likely to describe the followers of John the Baptist.

The writer in the Standard further says: "As for us we prefer to stay with the almost 5,000,000 Baptists of the United States, and the eternal New Testament truths, rather than unite with the 1,285,000 Disciples."

Of course the writer does not mean to say that might makes right, or that numbers determine the truth, or that quantity establishes quality, though such a conclusion might be fairly drawn. But why would it not suit the writer to belong to a still larger body than the Baptists by joining the Baptists and Disciples and make a body of 6,285,000? Why not conceive the still more worthy consummation of joining Baptists and Disciples with Methodists, Presbyterians and Lutherans; and all these with the Roman Catholics, and belong to a body numbering more than 20,000,000? Can anything less than this satisfy the desire of Christ? Is he willing that anyone who names his name shall be excluded from the fellowship of his people? If any one wants bigness, and with bigness, might, and with might the victory of Christ over all the earth, the way to it, and the only way is the way of Christian union.

IN THE TOILS OF FREEDOM

BY ELLA N. WOOD

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER VII.

The Strike.

The junior local was an organized branch of the breaker boys, door boys and drivers, and was the only "school" that most of them ever attended. Garry McFee was the president. Jean did not show as much interest in it as most of the other boys, and Garry was constantly urging him to attend regularly and take a more active part, but Jean had inherited something of the old, independent spirit of his father, and it grew upon him more strongly every day that he must get away from the whole thing.

One day at noon, when he came out of the breaker, there was great exeitement among the miners, and he soon found out that a strike of the drivers had been called.

Jacob Still, commonly known as "Jakey," was an old man who had worked about the mines for years, and lived in a little cabin back in the woods. He had never joined the union, but the miners all respected his age and the fact that he was a pioneer at the mines, and treated him with a certain degree of respect, and he went his way quietly, never interfering with the union men or their ideas. He usually worked as a laborer, and today had been placed in Garry McFee's section. Garry, feeling the importance of his position in the junior local and anxious to show his authority, refused to give Jakey any cars, and, throwing the old man's tools into an empty car, told him to take it and get out; that he could not have any more ears. Jakey went to the foreman and told him what Garry had said, and the foreman ordered Garry to furnish the old man with cars. This Garry refused to do, and going to several of the other drivers who were ready to report grievances and sympathize with their leader beeause he would not work with a "scab," before noon a strike was called and the operators were notified that they must discharge Jakey.

Garry McFee was the hero of the hour. The union men felt that he was a boy after their own hearts and he was highly eulogized in a mass meeting of the union.

Jean had a great liking for Jakey and had spent many hours listening to the violin which he played with a master hand. Some threats had been made by the boys, and while he would not report them, he determined to make sure that the old man had one friend; so after supper he went out to the lonely cabin.

"What do you think of the strike, Jakey?" asked Jean as he entered the cabin.

"Oh, the strike's all well enough. Let the boys have their fun."

"But won't you be discharged?"

"No-o, I guess not. They will get over it purty soon. Come, let's see how the old fiddle sounds tonight."

Jean saw that Jakey was not inclined to talk about the strike, so he sat down on the bunk and both were soon lost in the sweet strains of the violin.

Soon a loud knock startled them, the door was thrown open and a crowd of masked boys rushed into the room, and, quicker than it takes to tell it, bound Jakey hand and foot and earried him to the edge of the woods. The old man made no effort to escape. He would have gone with them willingly without being bound, for he felt sure that these boys whom he had known all their lives, and for whom he had made whistles, bows and arrows and kites, would not seriously hurt him, but he was soon undeceived; they tied him to a tree and nailed a board over his head on which was printed the word "Scab"; then they bound Jean's hands behind his back and marched him to his home and told Mr. Kirklin to keep his boy out of bad company or he would suffer the consequences.

When Jean told his father what the drivers had done to Jakey, Mr. Kirklin saw the labor leader, who at length ordered some of the union men to go and release him.

After the strike had lasted a week, Jakey was transferred to another section of the mine, and the strike came to an end; but it had cost the company several thousand dollars, and poor old Jakey never recovered from the suffering and exposure and soon died.

A few days after, Doctor Jones was pacing up and down the porch where Mr. Hathaway and Arthur Gordon were seated. Mr. Gordon was the resident officer of the company and a member of Mr. Hathaway's church, and they were discussing the recent strike.

"I tell you, gentlemen," said he, "I am not surprised at this strike of the driver boys. It is merely the result of their education."

"Doctor, one might be led to think that you were down on union labor," said Mr. Gordon.

"I am not down on union labor. Union labor is essential in this day of trusts; but what I say is, that when it is the only school our children have, as it is here in Minington, it is a mighty poor teacher. If those driver boys could have spent in school the four or five years that they have sat in the breaker, bending over the coal run this strike would never have happened. Every boy in Minington who is fifteen years old has seen at least three great strikes, and each one of these has left an indelible impression upon him. The words "strike," "scab," and "grievance," are words they hear oftenest in their lives. They are still children and cannot look at things from an intelligent point of view, so they try to assert their manhood by imitating those actions of their elders that have made the strongest impression upon them. I contend that education would abolish almost all the evils of union labor, and would place it on a higher standard of helpfulness."

"But, Doctor, how are you going to educate these boys when they will not go to school if they are permitted to?" asked Mr. Gordon.

"There is but one way to do that and that is for the legislature of our state to pass a strong, compulsory education law, and then insure the enforcement of it by appointing officers whose business shall be to see that all children under a certain age are in school."

"Well, Doctor, you are getting visionary," said Mr. Gordon, laughingly.

"Yes, that is what most of the good people in our state think," and Doctor Jones stamped up and down the poreh a little faster.

"That is just the reason why over 70,000 children in this state are put to hard work almost in infancy, are denied all the rights of childhood and grow up in ignoranee. Call me visionary, call me a fanatic or anything else you please, but I shall work for this law as long as the Lord gives me strength and I shall take good care that at least one man will push such a bill in our next legislature."

"You can count on at least one to help you, Doctor," said Mr. Hathaway.

"I see I will have some strong opponents to meet," said Mr. Gordon good naturedly, as he bade the gentlemen good evening. But as he went off down the street, he thought, "Forewarned, forearmed."

"Hathaway, it is going to be a hard matter to get any better laws regulating child labor," resumed Doctor Jones when Mr. Gordon had taken his departure. "It is just such men as Gordon that kill them in the lobby. Why, it has not been long sinee the age limit for children working in factories was reduced from thirteen years to twelve."

"Even this law is not enforced, Doctor. It is a case of 'What is everybody's business is nobody's business.' The only thing we can do is to agitate and persist in bringing forward a bill in every legislature, kill or no kill, and I have some plans for the war that I want to talk over with you as soon as they are a little more matured."

"Agitate, agitate! That is all right, but God help us, and pity the little children who are being dwarfed and killed while we are agitating!" said the old doctor.

"Awake! Thou That Sleepest."

BY ALWILDA EBERHART.

Awake! my heart, to hear;
Thy God, it is, who ealleth,
And waits to give thee light;
To shine on them that falter
In darkness of the night.
Awake! my heart, to hear.

Awake! my heart, to love;
For weary ones about thee,
Are walking all alone;
And empty hearts are longing
For love thyself hast known.
Awake! my heart, to love.

Awake! my heart, to work;
For soul-fields, white, before thee,
Are waiting for thy eare;
And preeious grain is rip'ning,
For heaven's garners, rare.
Awake! my heart, to work;

Awake! my heart, to give
Thy life, in full surrender,
To him who owns it all.
He measured not his giving;
Oh! answer now, his eall.
Awake! my heart, to give!

Brief History of New Orleans, our Convention City

W. M. Taylor.

In order to see and appreciate New Orleans properly our delegates should know something of its history.

The First French Colony.

The First French Colony was founded on the shores of Biloxi Bay, in 1699, by Iberville, a Canadian of French extraction. Meanwhile his brother Bienville sailed down the Mississippi to its mouth, where the French fleet was moored. Before reaching the mouth he met an English vessel under command of Capt. Bard. The Captain told him that he was examining the banks of the river to select a good site for an English settlement. Bienville told him that the French had already taken possession of the country and made it a dependency of Canada. Captain Bard then turned around and sailed to the gulf.

The Petticoat Insurrection.

Among the early arrivals in the French Colony founded by Iberville and Bienville were twenty young girls who were sent by the king of France to be married to the Colonists. In 1706, these girls becoming indignant at being fed on corn bread, held the first public meeting of women on the American continent. They threatened that if things did not improve they would return home at the first opportunity. In a few days they were placated and remained loyal and faithful wives. The uprising is known in history as "The Petticoat Insurrection."

The Founding of New Orleans.

Noting some unsatisfactory features in the location of the Biloxi settlement, and dreaming of a great port near the mouth of the Mississippi River, in 1718 Bienville determined to select a more suitable site for the capital of the colony. Taking with him fifty picked men he came upon the site of the old deserted Indian village "Houmas," which was located 110 miles from the mouth of the river. Here he decided to build his city. He called it New Orleans, after the Duc D'Orleans, who afterwards became Louis XIV. of France. It was in 1723 that New Orleans was made capital of the colony. The same year the infant city was visited by a hurricane that lasted three days, utterly ruining the crops and destroying many houses and the shipping in the harbor. Many of the settlers were so discouraged that they desired to leave New Orleans. But Bienville persuaded them to remain and rebuild the city.

The First Declaration of Independence.

In 1763 Louisiana was ceded by France to Spain. The colonists bitterly resented the cession and sent the first Spanish governor back to his country; then the most influential citizens rose in revolution against Spain and declared the independence of the colony. This was the first declaration of independence on American soil.

New Orleans a Dependency of Cuba.

Spain sent a fleet and 2,600 picked men to punish the conspirators. La Freniere, the leader of the revolution, met a mysterious death while on board one of the Spanish ships, and five of his companions were sentenced to be hanged; but not a man in the colony could be found willing to act as hangman; finally these men were shot and the other conspirators were sent to Havana, and confined in Moro Castle, and New Orleans was made a dependency of the island of Cuba.

Reconciliation and Amalgamation.

The next Spanish governor was Don Louis Unzaga. He completely won the colonists; he married a Creole lady, and the officers of his court and army also married Creoles. Finally the reconciliation and amalgamation of the inhabitants became complete and both French and Spanish worked in harmony for the up-building of the city; and their efforts were augmented by the coming of many wealthy and titled refugees from San Domingo.

Ceded Back to France, Then to the United States.

The first of October, 1800, a secret treaty was concluded between the king of Spain and Napoleon Bonaparte for the French republic.

Napoleon being at that time in war with England and fearing that New Orleans would be seized by that power, ordered his ministers to enter into negotiations with the United States. The negotiations resulted in a treaty which was signed at Paris in 1803 by which France ceded Louisiana to the United States, and when Napoleon was informed of the treaty, he made the celebrated remark, "This accession of territory strengthens forever the power of the United States, and I have just given to England a Maratime rival that will, sooner or later, humble her pride."

The American government took possession Dec. 20, 1803, just a few weeks after the retrocession of Louisiana to France; the people bitterly resented being sold "like a lot of cattle" and appealed to France, but Napoleon was too busy changing the map of Europe to pay any attention to them.

Louisiana was admitted into the Union April 30, 1812, as a state. January 8, 1815, General Andrew Jackson and his band of Creole and American soldiery won a famous victory over the British on the Plains of Chalmette. This great conflict is called the "Battle of New Orleans."

Under American Regime.

With the American domination a marvelous period of prosperity began. Ancient barriers were demolished, forts torn down and the city spread away up and out beyond her original limits. Differences growing out of trade arose between the Creoles and Americans, and the latter built an American city above Canal street. The greatest rivalry prevailed between the two sections of New Orleans, but as time passed on, Creoles and Americans seeing the necessity of unions, laid aside their differences and re-united under one municipality.

In 1861 Louisiana seceded from the union; in 1862 New Orleans surrendered to Admiral Farragut, martial law was declared and Gen. Butler was put in command. This condition continued until the close of the struggle. New Orleans suffered greatly during the war; her commerce was destroyed and for many years after the war business was at a standstill, but revival of trade began twenty-five years ago and progress has been astonishingly rapid ever since.

New Orleans spreads out over an area of 195 square miles; has a population of nearly 400,000, has the best street car system in America, is spending $25,000,000 in municipal improvements, her docks accommodate ships from all over the world, she is leading the markets of America in sugar, cotton, rice and fruit, and is advancing rapidly in all lines of export and import trade.

It is in the heart of this great world metropolis that the Disciples of Christ are to gather in our International Christian Missionary Convention next October 9-15, and it behooves us to gather in such numbers and to bring such a spirit as will mark a new era in the religious history, at least, of this city which is destined to exert a great influence over the whole world.

A Venician Pageant.

Had I timed my visit to Venice I could not have done better, for I assisted at a ceremony that originally took place nearly 400 years ago and will never take place again. I was present at the funeral of a doge! Now Venice has not been ruled by a doge for more than a hundred years, but this particular doge, Sebastiano Veniero, died over 300 years ago and was decently buried at Murano, and one might have supposed that that was the end of him. This was not, however, the place indicated in his will; no attention was paid to his wishes until his remains, with the heart intact, were brought to Venice in June last. Then all that was left of this distinguished doge and brave soldier—for he commanded the Venetian flotilla at the battle of Lepanto in 1571—was placed in the church of S. Giovanni and Paolo, where his statue done by Antonio Dal-Zotto stands in a conspicuous place. I had been saying all the time I was in Venice that it was a great pity one could not see the gondolas decked in gay colors and manned by gaily costumed gondoliers as in the days of the doges; and here, as though by the touch of a necromancer's wand, we were taken back nearly 400 years.

I had not heard of the funeral, and was drifting about idly in my gondola when the scene of splendor burst upon my gaze. You may be surprised at the idea of a funeral being a scene of splendor, but the barge in which the remains of the great Veniero lay was gay in red velvet and cloth of gold and was towed by a gorgeous gondola with gondoliers in the costumes of his day. In the one black covered gondola sat a cardinal in robes of scarlet, and before him in an open gondola draped in black came the one surviving Veniero, the one living descendant of the fighting doge, an old man, the very image of his ancestor, dressed in black broadcloth with a deep mourning band upon his tall hat. There was nothing more interesting in the whole pageant than this gray-bearded descendant of the great doge: the last of his line, too, for my gondolier told me, with a tone of reproach in his voice, that Signor Veniero, though rich, was a bachelor.

As the funeral cortege floated by, we followed it to the doge's palace, where it landed and was met by a cordon of soldiers and sailors and a military band playing a funeral march: the very march, I should say, judging from the style of the music, that was played at this doge's first funeral, centuries ago.—Putnam's.

The Summer of the Soul.

It seems but a few days since, shivering under cast winds and cold grey skies, we said to our hearts that one day summer would come again. Other things may fail us in the flutter of the changeful leaves of life, but God's order rolls on without a break; unhasting and unresting, the seasons in array like a pageant move by, unaffected by sorrow or joy, by the cry of the newborn or the faint last sigh of those whom death calls. So in its turn summer has come round once more, another pledge of the unfailing promises of God. The gardens are growing gay with flowers, every village lane is a cloistered path of glorious green, the woods are full of radiant sunbeams and glades of mystery, and every field and meadow, with Canaan's freshness, "stand dressed in living green." It is possible that there are men and women to whom all this means nothing at all, for whom the Lord brocades his world in vain, whose eyes bending downward are holden save to the things that are poor and unworthy. To the children it is not so, God bless them! Nor to the sick, nor the aged, whose eyes already begin to peer for the daybreak beyond Jordan.

What is the Message of the Summer?

God's pictures are all parables, and there is nothing without signification or spiritual meaning for the soul of man. Although harvest has not yet come, the summer is the season of growth and prosperity. We know such times in the history of our heart experience. Hours of blessing—sometimes with the multitude praising God, oftener perchance in the sanctuary of our inner chamber telling him how much we delight in his mercy and love. Special favor has been granted of guidance in times of perplexity, of deliverance in moments of danger, of grace given when temptation was very sore. Something has been given unto us, some one spared as treasure to our heart: we are in the sunshine, it is God's summer day. Let us rejoice and be glad in it.

There are minds constructed upon such a peculiar plan that at a time of special blessing they feel it incumbent upon them to keep themselves humble by finding mournful thoughts. They assure us that it is better to anticipate evil than be too happy with present good. This may be philosophy, but it is not religion. When God sends summer, he does not mean us to pine for the frost; when he maketh glad, it is that we may sing; when he giveth quietness, it is that we may have his peace. According to the scriptures the normal condition of the Christian is happiness and trust; even under persecutions he has visions, in tribulations he counts it all joy. Let us never be afraid of being cheerful; the smile of the saints is always more prevalent with men than are their tears and groanings.

The Perils of the Summer.

Yet the sunshine has its perils, and the summer time of the soul needs vigilant watchfulness. By grace abounding we can stand anything, but it takes a very good man to keep his feet long in times of prosperity, spiritual as well as financial. The most subtle temptation in the world is the thought that we are in such a state of personal perfection that we have little patience for others who cannot or will not find their way thither. In some this takes the form of special enlightenment in the meaning of scripture: we have solved everything, and in this year of grace pose as the discoverers of new texts and interpretations undreamt of before. This is a hotbed of spiritual pride. To create a little self-advertisement, to talk about being "nothing, nothing," and yet so jealous and sensitive of our names being overlooked! O, the pity of it!

But summer, the holiday season, is a time of happy restfulness. We all want it badly. Life is so strenuous, exacting—hard enough for most folks; hardest, perhaps, for some who never seem to soil their fingers, but carry heavy burdens of responsibility and care they cannot always leave behind when they lock the door. "O rest in the Lord." Whether we say this or sing it, happy are we if we know it as the rest which Jesus gives his own.

The meadows sleep in sunlight, and the hills,
  Silent and nearest heaven, like watchers stand;
God's wondrous calm the softened spirit fills,
  His mercy meets our thought on every hand.
Like tired children near their mother's breast
We look into His face and sweetly rest.

We were as nigh when, in the hurrying street,
  Amid the crush of care and wild alarms,
We failed to recognize his blessed feet,
  Nor saw around His everlasting arms;
And when we went to rest we little knew
How much our gracious Lord had brought us through.

O, brighter than this glorious sun to me
  Is that sweet radiance of my present Lord!
O, fairer than all else, I love to see
  His face meet mine within the open Word!
  I touch His jeweled garment here and feel
  That secret virtue which the soul can heal.

—Jesse Page, in The Christian.

Old Jack.

The Story of a Girl Who Tried to Be Brave.

The very first day she was in the country, Ellen saw old Jack. He stood in the middle of the north pasture and bellowed at her, with his head down and two little horns sticking out on either side.

"Would he hurt us if we went in?" Ellen asked, wonderingly.

"He'd eat us right up," answered little Georgie, who was only four, but had lived in the country all his life.

"Then I'm not going near him," said Ellen decidedly. "I don't like bulls at all, if that's what they do."

That evening she asked Uncle John whether old Jack was really as bad as Georgie has said. Her uncle nodded his head in a queer way and smiled.

"If you got in front of him when his chain was off, you'd think so. He broke away last summer, and it took three of us to chase him back into the field. I was glad, that day, that I had a good club with me."

"And can he run fast?" Ellen inquired, in an awestricken voice.

"If he ever takes after you, you might as well stand still and wait for him. He'd catch you, anyway. But sometimes bulls won't touch a person who doesn't run."

Ellen made up her mind on the spot, that she would never try to find out whether old Jack would touch her or not. He was altogether too ugly and bad-tempered to be trifled with. But nearly every morning she would go down to the north pasture to look at him from a safe place behind the fence.

One morning she went there, as usual, with little Georgie, and old Jack was not to be seen.

"I know why," said Georgie, clapping his hands. "Papa said he was going to sell him, and now he's done it. The mean old thing can't scare us any more."

"Then we can go into that field just the same as any other!" cried Ellen. "I'm so glad, because—" she whispered into Georgie's ear—"Uncle John says there are mushrooms there. Let's look for some right away, so that we can take them back for dinner."

Georgie agreed willingly, and in a trice they were over the fence. Ellen felt as brave as could be, now that old Jack was gone. She peered to right and left on the ground, and presently, sure enough, she saw a round, white mushroom peeping up at her. At the same moment Georgie found one, too, and as they went farther into the field, there were others. Ellen had lifted her pinafore, to serve as a basket, and it was really becoming almost full.

Suddenly Georgie dropped a mushroom he had just found, with a shriek.

"Look!" he cried. "He was there all the time! He's coming right at us, now!"

Ellen looked toward the other side of the pasture, and there was old Jack! He was coming at a steady trot, with his eyes fixed full upon her and Georgie.

"Run, Georgie!" she shouted; and then she remembered her uncle's words. It was no use to run. "I know what I'll do," she said to herself, with a little tightening of the lips. "I'll stay here; then he won't touch Georgie, even if he does hurt me."

The bull came on, at the same slow trot. Ellen was trembling, but she stood her ground bravely. Presently a shout told her that Georgie had reached the fence. A second shout, and—she gave a cry of joy; it was her uncle's voice. In another moment she felt quite indignant, because he was laughing at her, and coming across the field without any hurry at all; and what was stranger still, the bull had stopped and begun to nibble the grass.

"Oh, I'm so glad you came!" Ellen sobbed, with her uncle's arm around her. "Old Jack was coming straight toward us, but I didn't run because I wanted Georgie to reach the fence first."

For reply, Uncle John took her hand and led her right up to the big animal in front of them.

"Do you see who its is?" he asked mischievously.

Ellen stared a moment; then her tears changed to laughter.

"Why, it's only our old Bessie cow!" she cried. "And I thought I was so brave!"

But her uncle was not laughing, now. He looked down at her, admiringly.

"I still think you are," he said.—Sunday-school Times.

Why Conquer?

It is better to resist temptation from an unworthy motive than not to resist at all. Jesus Christ was the only man whose right-doing was always and only prompted by the highest of motives. It is a common experience to find oneself steeling himself against sin or failure of any sort because he is seeking other special help from God in some great need just then. A victory over temptation from such a motive is far from ideal, yet it is better than no victory at all; and God will help us to rise even by means of such halfway victories up to the high achievement of hating and conquering all sin merely because it is sin. Let us realize that there is no difference between failures, that every temptation yielded to is a complete break with God and character; and let us strive to conquer temptation because every such victory is, after the gift of the Son which makes it possible, the supremest blessing that God can give his children.—Sunday-school Times.

An Ideal Friendship.*

Among the Bible records which allure and delight the reader and listener, there are none more beautiful than the friendship of David and Jonathan. Even the rare fidelity of Ruth to Naomi does not warm our hearts more than this choice meeting of two kindred spirits, whose career of love was so early cut off. When the great friendships of the world are remembered, those of Pelydes and Orestes, Damon and Pythias, Hamlet and Horatio and David and Jonathan easily take precedence.

This friendship of the two young Hebrews was singular in that it was untouched by the jealousy which might well have sundered them. Jonathan was Saul's oldest son, and as such might be expected to succeed his father as king. Certainly Saul expected that he would. The law of succession in Israel was not established at this time, and it was uncertain whether the kings would be elected by the people, or chosen by the prophets, or selected by the last king from among his sons, or ascend to the throne in virtue of being the first-born son. In fact, all these methods prevailed in the early days of the monarchy. Yet the most natural expectation was that the eldest son should reign. On the other hand, it soon became apparent at the court of Saul that David was a strong favorite in the nation, and might easily win sufficient favor to secure the kingdom. But though the king was troubled over this matter, and grew more and more suspicious of his young officer, the friendship between these two young men grew ever closer and more tender. Neither counted his future as worth anything in comparison with the love he bore his comrade.

Their first meeting, so far as our sources inform us, was at David's arrival at the tent of Saul with the trophies of his victory over the Philistine giant. If David had been Saul's armor-bearer before this time, he must of course have known Jonathan. But it is apparent that their love was of rapid and secure growth. They even exchanged garments in token of their close friendship. No doubt when their duties permitted, they were inseparable companions. David counted the friendship of Jonathan the rarest blessing of his life.

Nor is it unlikely that the best traits of David's character were the product of his association with Jonathan. So far as we are able to trace the disposition of the son of Saul, he is the ideal gentleman of the Old Testament. He easily divides honors with Joseph as the model young man of the early Bible history. We know but little of his life, to be sure, but that little is so satisfying that the judgment of the reader is not difficult to form regarding him.

On the other hand, the character of David is far less attractive at the first. To be sure, he had those elements of personality which made him popular. He was handsome, frank, brave. He was accomplished in the arts of war and peace. But he was little scrupulous as to the methods he took to gain his ends. He would not scruple to deceive, if his safety depended on it, and the kindly priests at Nob had bitter cause to regret the lie he told them (1 Sam. 21, 22). There were many elements of selfishness and cruelty in his life which the student was compelled to recognize.

Yet, in spite of this, one sees that David was a man who struggled up through much temptation and evil impulse to better things, so that he is not unworthy to stand among the great men of Israel. His is not a sinless life, but it is one which bears the marks of struggle and victory. Now how much of this better part of David's life did he owe to his friend Jonathan? One is inclined to believe that much of his best disposition came to him from that friendship. Jonathan was absolutely without taint of self-seeking. That is a great thing to say of any man. When he saw that the heart of the nation was set upon David, he freely suggested that his friend take the throne and let him be his counsellor and companion. No more generous proposal was ever made.

It could hardly be otherwise than that in the days that came after the untimely death of his good friend, David sat often to think of the youth whose life had been knit so fast with his own. For Jonathan, the most accomplished bowman in Israel, whose shooting of arrows was the wonder of the people, he had a deep and a lasting affection. No rivalries had ever come between them. The saddest spot on earth to David was the scarred top of Gilboa, where his friend fell amid the heaps of the slain. In his lament over the dead he cries:

"Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no rain nor dew upon you, Neither fields of offerings."

"Tell me a man's friends, and I will tell you what sort of a man he is," was the wise comment of a student of human nature. In David alone we should have had a man far less admirable and lovable than the Old Testament shows us. In David as he is, we have the native courage and persistence of the man, softened and refined by the nobler graces of Jonathan. What their lives might have been if Jonathan had survived we cannot tell. But may we not believe that the young prince did actually live on in the influence which he had come to exert upon his friend, and thus he played his true part in the history of his land in spite of his untimely death. Many a man lives thus "in souls made better by his presence."

There is no nobler elegy in literature than David's lament for Jonathan. Whatever else we have from the "sweet singer of Israel," these words would make him worthy of that title:

"How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle!
O Jonathan, slain upon thy high places!
I am distressed for thee my brother Jonathan;
Most dear hast thou been unto me.
Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.
How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished."

Lesson XI.—The Devotional and Elegiac Writings of the Old Testament.

The third class of Old Testament writings comprises the devotional and elegiac books. These may be grouped together, for both are poetical and both are in a measure filled with the spirit of prayer. They are two in number: Psalms and Lamentations.

The Book of Psalms is the collection of the prayers and praises of the people of Israel gathered first in the days of the second temple, about 500 B. C. It is composed of hymns which probably came from the different periods of the national life, from the days of David till the last edition was formed in the times of the Maccabaean uprising (175 B. C.). Many of the psalms were ascribed to David by the Jewish editors of the book, who supplied the headings to the individual psalms. From this fact arose the custom of referring to the entire book as "Psalms of David." The psalms are divided into five books (perhaps to correspond with the five books of the Law). These five books are separated in the Revised Editions and each closes with a doxology. The titles of the Psalms are not to be regarded as the authentic statements of the authorship or circumstances of the individual psalms, but as the accepted views of the Jewish scholars who edited them. In addition to conjectures regarding the composers of the psalms and the incidents which suggested them, the the nature of the psalms, the fact (in many instnances) that it was taken from the collection of "the chief musician" or choir leader, and that it was to be sung to a particular melody or instrument. Many of the psalms are divided by the word "selah" into strophes or stanzas. The psalms were the hymns used by the Jewish people in the worship of the second and third temples, by the Christian church in its earliest years, and by most of the Christian communions since that time. Some of the greatest hymns of the church are either paraphrases of, or are based upon, the psalms.

The Book of Lamentations is a collection of threnodies or dirges over the downfall of Jerusalem in the year 586 B. C., when the king of Babylon carried many of the people into captivity and destroyed the city. In five poems the book describes the awful fate of the city and its people. These elegies are among the most plaintive and pathetic in literature. It was the ancient tradition that the poems were composed by Jeremiah, the "weeping prophet" of Jerusalem. But this is not indicated by the book itself.

High Thinking and What It Will Do. Topic. Aug. 26. Phil. 4:4-9.

The philosopher Des Cartes undertook to doubt everything that could be called in question and he came to the conclusion that thinking was the ultimate fact which he could not doubt. He found himself, in the last analysis, a thinking being. Whatever fault may be charged against his method and its results, we may thank him for the emphasis he put upon thinking. Naturally, if we are to follow a philosopher, we must attempt to think consistently and to make our thought as complete as we can. And this brings us to the exhortation of Paul that we should think upon the best. The apostle is not giving lessons in the logic of the schools but in that of life. The questions with which he would have us deal, pertain to godly living. He writes for those who are face to face with strong temptations. The problems confronting them demand an immediate practical solution.

The Presence of the Best.

Every one knows how difficult it is to command good thoughts. We can understand the good woman who, on hearing it said of another that she found good in a certain tabooed system of religion, said, "But why doesn't she look for the bad?" That is just it. We are suspicious of what is strange, like our savage ancestors. We prefer to believe that it is bad and we are greatly distressed if our judgment is shown to be wrong. But even when familiarity has enabled us to separate the good from the bad, we often seem to be under the power of the bad in spite of ourselves. But the fault is with our method. We cannot play the tyrant with ideas. They have their rights which they dare to maintain. They come to us in their own way. We must put ourselves in the presence of the best and try to think the best. If we are jealous and suspicious, it is something to know our sin but the cure does not necessarily follow knowledge. A study of the life of Jonathan or of General Charles Gordon will do more for the soul than all the self-chiding that we can summon to our aid. If we think daily of Christ as the friend of man, good thoughts will come to us in abundance.

Rejoice.

Paul had a right to bid the Philippians rejoice because he had given them reasons for joy. The only exhortation that has any sort of justification is that which urges a man to live according to his deepest convictions. Your resolution is stronger when you learn that your neighbor is your helper. The exhortation that is entitled to respect is the announcement to the struggling man that another is engaged in the same struggle and will help him. Great thoughts give joy. Christianity adds to the joy of living because it offers to men great thoughts of duty and destiny.

Moderation.

Paul assumes that Christian people are moderate. "Sweet reasonableness" is a Christian virtue. Zeal that burns up that which is evil is becoming in a disciple of Jesus but not the fanaticism that drinks the blood of unbelievers. Christ is the Saviour of all. His people must therefore be reasonable in their treatment of others. They dishonor the Master when they attempt to ride rough-shod over the opinions of men who may have shown a disposition to think for themselves on questions of religion. The sword has been drawn against men because of their unbelief but never to the honor of Christ. The cure for the fanaticism of professed Christians is more Christianity. The mind that is filled with the great ideas of Christianity will be moderate in its dealings with the peculiarities of other minds.

The Peace of God.

We are commanded to be free from anxiety of the baser sort. Precious time and energy are squandered in anxious thought. While one sits in gloom, another does a glorious deed. Men tell us that activity will destroy doubt. Yes, if it means anything. But running in a circle is lacking in edifying power for the man of sense. He is willing to expend energy if he gets something in return. If there is that which is true, venerable, just, pure, lovely, and of abiding worth, we can find peace in the pursuit of it, and it will be the peace of God.

VACATION RELIGION.

Vacation Religion—if you would have any, be sure to carry it with you. Don't take your camera and fishing-rod and bathing-suit and Balzac, and forget your Bible. You are off for a rest and recuperation, but don't rest body and mind at the expense of the soul.

And be sure it is rest you are getting. Revel in the sunshine and the freshening breezes and the glories of nature; but don't be carried away by the hysterical excesses and excitements which are inseparable from the average pleasure resort. Don't let others rob you of the opportunity which the hills and woods afford for quiet-hour meditation.

Quiet-Hour meditation.

And, lastly, don't forget the multitude, the thoughtless, selfish, Sabbath-breaking multitude. Their presence near you will give you many an opportunity to let "let your light shine," and exercise your practical Christian Endeavor.

REV. W. H. BARRACLOUGH.

Some Bible Hints.

Read Mark 6:30: The apostles had been engaged in work for Christ that must have taxed their strength and their sympathies, much as it doubtless delighted them. The best preparation for enjoying a vacation rest is to have done with one's might work that is worth while.

Read Mark 6:31: Christ did not spare himself, but he knew the weakness of his followers' flesh, and it was at his call, only that they sought quiet and rest. He was mindful of their need, even although there was still no lack of opportunity for service, all the more because they were so crowded.

Read Mark 6:32: When the work must be given up for a time, the best place is where one may be out of the crowd, but with Christ. A vacation for a Christian is not a time to get into the world and away from Christ: he is not seeking a vacation from religion.

Read Mark 6:34: Even the wildest country may have its call to service; its very lack of opportunities may be the strongest claim for sympathy with those in need of help and inspiration. In responding to the call even the wearied worker for the Master will sometimes find new blessings and strength for his own need.—C. E. World.

Has Christian Endeavor a Future?

Not infrequently this question is heard from people who are making little of a very valuable instrument for the advancement of the kingdom of God. The best answers are the reports of what individuals and groups are doing in the name of Christian Endeavor. Here is a short list reported at one meeting:

"Two of our members walk up and down the street before the evening service, and invite people into God's house."

"Our society has been the means of binding to the church a large proportion of the converts of a revival held two years ago."

"Our Endeavor has been the means of re-starting the weekly church prayer-meeting."

"Our young lady members take it in turn to bring and take home the women of the blind institute, which is greatly appreciated by them."

"Our members stand in the chapel porch to welcome any stranger present."

"Three members have formed a Mission Band."

"Helped some of our active members to become members of the church."

"Started several districts for free distribution of sermons, with invitations to attend our church services."

"We held special meetings during the year, and as a result we rejoice in thirty-five souls won for Christ and the church."

Union of Baptists and Disciples—Two Suggestions.

The time is ripe for the uniting of these two denominations in the North but it is not true of conditions in the South when we take the South as a whole. But, wherever, and whenever it is done we must make haste slowly and see that it is done upon a basis and in a way which will not sacrifice the essentials, nor be a loss to either of the denominations, as is the case in some instances. Each individual church can best serve Christ in its wider service through the denomination, and anything that cripples its service in any way is to be deplored. That this may not be done I venture to offer the following:

Let there be no unions accomplished until a committee from each of the general conventions of the two denominations can be appointed and each work out a basis for union and then jointly work out a basis; report back to and be passed upon by the conventions appointing the committees, and then be recommended to the various churches composing the conventions. This will give denominational uniformity and materially help out in every way. If this does not meet with approval (various sections of the country may not be ripe for it) let the same procedure be taken by the state conventions of the two denominations. However, I prefer the former method and believe it would be much more satisfactory and accomplish more. At the same time these committees are appointed let another committee be appointed from each convention jointly to work out a basis for the consolidation of the publishing houses, educational institutions and missionary agencies of the two denominations. No doubt it will take quite a great deal longer to accomplish the latter than the former. In fact the former would have to precede the latter. Since it takes time to do this that is the very reason why we should make a start,—why we should take first steps. As fast as we come to each other's viewpoint on doctrine let us unite in organization.

An American Hero.

"One morning in January, when the ice in the Hudson River ran unusually heavy," says F. Hopkinson Smith, in Everybody's, "a Hoboken ferry-boat slowly crunched her way through the floating floes, until the thickness of the pack choked her paddles in mid-river. It was an early morning trip, and the decks were crowded with laboring men and the driveways choked with teams; the women and children standing inside the cabins were a solid mass up to the swinging doors. While she was gathering strength for a further effort, an ocean tug sheered to avoid her, veered a point, and crashed into her side, cutting her below the waterline in a great V-shaped gash. A moment more and the disabled boat careened from the shock and fell over on her beam, helpless. Into the V-shaped gash the water poured a torrent. It seemed but a question of minutes before she would lunge headlong below the ice.

"Within 200 yards of both boats, and free of the heaviest ice, steamed the wrecking-tug "Reliance" of the Off-shore Wrecking Company, and on her deck forward stood Capt. Thomas Scott. When the ocean tug reversed her engines after the collision and backed clear of the shattered wheel-house of the ferry-boat, he sprang forward, stooped down, ran his eye along the water-line, noted in a flash every shattered plank, climbed into the pilot-house of his own boat, and before the astonished pilot could catch his breath, pushed the nose of the "Reliance" along the rail of the ferry-boat and dropped upon the latter's deck like a cat.

"With a threat to throw overboard any man who stirred, he dropped into the engine-room, met the engineer half-way up the ladder, compelled him to return, dragged the mattresses from the crew's bunks, stripped off blankets, snatched up clothes, overalls, cotton waste and rags of carpet, cramming them into the great rent left by the tug's cutwater.

"It was useless. Little by little the water gained, bursting out first below, then on one side, only to be caulked out again, and only to rush in once more.

"Captain Scott stood a moment as if undecided, ran his eye searchingly over the engine-room, saw that for his needs it was empty, then deliberately tore down the top wall of caulking he had so carefully built up, and, before the engineer could protest, forced his own body into the gap, with his arm outside, level with the drifting ice.

"An hour later, the disabled ferry-boat, with every soul on board, was towed into the Hoboken slip.

"When they lifted the captain from the wreck, he was unconscious and barely alive. The water had frozen his blood, and the floating ice had torn the flesh from his protruding arm from shoulder to wrist. When the color began to creep back to his cheeks, he opened his eyes and said to the doctor who was winding the bandages:

"'Wuz any of them babies hurt?'

"A month passed before he regained his strength, and another week before the arm had healed so that he could get his coat on. Then he went back to the 'Reliance.'"

Concert Pitch.

If all the members of the orchestra were to assemble and at once to begin each to play his part, the result would be an earsplitting discord. Where is the trouble? In the lack of one thing, the "concert pitch." The first necessity is, that each instrument must be attuned to the concert pitch. With it, there is harmony; without it, discord. When a church or committee, or a Christian assembly come together, and each begins to give utterance to his own preference, and seeks to have his own way, there is discord and confusion. We have been in such gatherings, both large and small, and mentally have said: "They lack the concert pitch." In all Christian activity, service and conversation, the concert pitch is the will of God. Every Christian who would be used of the Spirit in the service of God, or who would live in any way well-pleasing to the Father, must bow much in prayer, seeking the mind of the Lord. Only thus can the soul be kept at the concert pitch of doing the will of God. Whenever we meet together for the worship of our Lord, let our first aim be to get the concert pitch.—Selected.

Nightfall.

The dear, long, quiet summer day
Draws to its close.
To the deep woods I steal away
To hear what the sweet thrush will say
In her repose.

Beside the brook the meadow rue
Stands tall and white.
The water softly slips along,
A murmur to the thrush's song,
To greet the night.

Over and over, like a bell,
Her song rings clear;
The trees stand still in joy and prayer,
Only the angels stir the air,
High heaven bends near.

I bow my head and lift my heart
In Thy great peace.
Thy Angelus, my God, I heed.
By the still waters wilt Thou lead
Till days shall cease.

Be Strong.

Be strong to hope, O heart!
Though day is bright,
The stars can only shine
In the dark night.
Be strong, O heart of mine
Look towards the light!

Be strong to bear, O heart!
Nothing is vain.
Strive not, for life is care,
And God sends pain,
Heaven is above, and there
Rest will remain!

Be strong to love, O heart!
Love knows not wrong.
Didst thou love, creatures even,
Life were not long.
Didst thou love God in heaven
Thou wouldst be strong.

He and his wife are now enjoying a visit with their parents in Plymouth, Ohio.

FRANK NAOTARO OTSUKA.

The Englewood Church of Chicago was recently visited by Mr. Otsuka, who has been a member of that congregation for a number of years. His visit was in the nature of a farewell for he will soon go to Japan to support himself in missionary work. The esteem of the church and interest in his work were manifest when a fund of almost $70 was given him. Mr. Otsuka is a graduate of Bethany College and has a Bachelor of Divinity degree from the University of Chicago. He goes to his native land well trained for his labors, in which he will be supported by gifts from friends in America and by his own labors.

Evangelist H. Gordon Bennett writes us of the evangelistic conference at Bethany Park, Ind., that the first Sunday was a great day in the matter of attendance, seven thousand persons being on the ground and four thousand attending services. He adds that if there was any purpose in the gathering for an opposition movement to our missionary organizations it was still-born, for the spirit of the gathering was one of humility and unity.

At the Interdenominational Conference of Women's Missionary Societies just closed at Northfield, Mass., the Christian Woman's Board of Missions was represented on the program by Prof. H. J. Derthick of Hazel Green, Ky. His description of the successful work being carried on for the mountain people won much praise. Mrs. E. T. Rummell of New York was the only delegate representing our women. She says that the display of C. W. B. M. literature was among the best at the conference.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR REVIVAL.

At the second meeting of our four weeks' Christian Endeavor Revival at First Christian Church, eleven were added to the membership of the society. The invitation having been given by the president of the C. E. ten were added to the church. Not a preacher in the house. We have been without a pastor for four months. This is a remarkable church. We believe we have the most fruitful field in the brotherhood. THOMAS C. CLARK.

ALMOST A SHADOW.

Gained 20 lbs. on Grape-Nuts.

There's a wonderful difference between a food which merely tastes good and one which builds up strength and good healthy flesh.

It makes no difference how much we eat unless we can digest it. It is not really food to the system until it is absorbed. A York state woman says:

"I had been a sufferer for ten years with stomach and liver trouble, and had got so bad that the least bit of food such as I then knew, would give me untold misery for hours after eating.

"I lost flesh until I was almost a shadow of my original self, and my friends were quite alarmed about me.

"First I dropped coffee and used Postum, then began to use Grape-Nuts although I had little faith it would do me any good.

"But I continued to use the food and have gained twenty pounds in weight and feel like another person in every way. I feel as if life had truly begun anew for me.

"I can eat anything I like now in moderation, suffer no ill effects, be on my feet from morning until night. Whereas a year ago they had to send me away from home for rest while others cleaned house for me, this spring I have been able to do it myself all alone.

"My breakfast is simply Grape-Nuts with cream and a cup of Postum, with sometimes an egg and a piece of toast, but generally only Grape-Nuts and Postum. And I can work until noon and not feel as tired as one hour's work would have made me a year ago." "There's a Reason."

CHURCH EXTENSION NOTES.

Remember the annual offering for Church Extension begins Sunday, September 6.

It pays to make the money, which God has trusted us to use, do perpetual service in our Church Extension Fund.

Our Church Extension Board has helped to build over seventy church homes since last October. The board expects to make its best report at New Orleans.

Last year 1,416 churches, as churches, sent offerings to the Church Extension Board. There ought to be a great increase this year.

Last week an annuity of $500 was received by the Church Extension Board from a friend in Pennsylvania. Many such gifts should come to this board because they build churches at once. For information, write to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

HUMAN LUXURIES AND DIVINE NECESSITIES.

The question of Christian giving is not between missions and charity nor between home and foreign missions. It is between selfishness and God. The failure of five out of six of our churches to have fellowship in the annual church extension offering is not due, as their officers sometimes fancy, and their preacher generally pleads, to the great sacrifices they are makiing for Christian service in other directions, but to the complete absorption of their incomes in personal and selfish interests. The standard of living is not an absolute measure like the yard stick, but is usually the style maintained by our wealthier neighbors. The vagabond of the desert or the slum longs for four walls and a roof. The man who has a one room shack is striving to secure a two room shanty. The citizen who dwells in a five room cottage aspires to an eight room house, and the one who has twelve rooms looks upon thirty as absolutely necessary to the comfort of his family and occasional guests.

But before any question of more or less house, furniture, clothing or amusements, the divine necessity of immortal souls is salvation through Christ. The first duty laid upon the one who is saved is to bear a part in saving others. A primal law of the new life in Christ Jesus is sympathy for our brethren.

The work of church extension is the organized and practical sympathy of our entire great brotherhood for the brethren that are without church homes. Through it those who are scattered in strange places are furnished the means of grace. Under its beneficent service the Bread of Life is given to the lost. The centennial aim of a million dollars is not for the purpose of boasting of a big fund, but is the measure of the actual necessities of the work. Let human luxuries wait on divine necessities and every church will be able to make an offering and the fund will be brought up to the centennial standard when we reach Pittsburgh in 1909.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

KENTUCKY AND CHURCH EXTENSION.

A casual glance at the report of the Kentucky exhibit in the last annual report of Church Extension is by no means gratifying. The more carefully you examine the report the less satisfaction you feel. From all sources the board received last year from our state only $2,703.32. They loaned $2,000.00 to one church and without the loan we might have lost a valuable piece of property.

Only fifty-five churches gave any thing to this work of such great importance to our whole brotherhood. We have given in every way $60,838.05 since the work of church extension was started. Of this I know that $20,000.00 was given on the annuity plan by one man and his wife and the board is paying annuity interest on that now. I have not the figures in the case, but it is probable that not more than $30,000.00 have been given by the churches in the past eighteen years. Twenty-four loans have been made to Kentucky fields—aggregating $15,665, and only about one-half of that has been paid back.

Brethren, we have nothing to be proud of in this record. Let us in September start out on a new career. We could multiply the number of contributing churches by four and then not be puffed up with pride. We have needy churches now that ought to build and cannot do so without help from the Board of Church Extension.

Brethren of Kentucky, let us bestir in a way worthy of our state and of this great cause. Let us make such an advance in our offerings in September as will at least not be discreditable.

H. W. Elliott, Secretary.

Sulphur, Ky., August 4, 1908.

A MISTAKE CORRECTED.

It was announced some weeks ago in the papers that $15,000 had been pledged by our people of Oregon for a steamer for the Congo. This was an error. Dr. Dye's telegram, through some error in transmission, read as above, when it should have read $2,300. This splendid sum was pledged at the Oregon state convention. It has since been increased to over $3,000. An active committee has been appointed and steps taken to push the matter with enthusiasm until the $15,000 is reached. A steamer for our great work on the Congo is one of our most needy enterprises.

Encouraging gain in Receipts of the Foreign Society.

We are pleased to report that the month of July shows a good increase all along the line over the same month last year. The total gain for the month has been a little over $9,700. The tide has turned. Every effort needs to be put forward now to bring up the receipts all along the line. We must depend mainly on the churches and Sunday-schools. It looks as though the receipts from these two sources could be brought up to what they were last year in spite of the hard times. Let every church and Sunday-school which has not sent an offering this year do so at once.

New Missionaries for the Field.

It is the purpose of the Foreign Society to send out thirteen new missionaries to the various fields in September. The effort was made to send fifty new workers this year. Altogether, thirty have been appointed. Eight have already been sent, nine will be held over until next year, and the remaining thirteen will sail if the funds are available to send them. The whole fifty could probably have been found and sent if the financial depression had not come. The names of those who expect to sail in September are as follows: J. C. Archer and wife, of Newton Falls, Ohio, graduates of Hiram College, who will go to Jubbulpore, India; Dr. Z. S. Loftus, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., who goes to Thibet; Miss Mamie Longan, of Drake, who goes to the Philippines; Miss Sylvia Siegfried, Hiram College, who goes to Cuba; H. A. Eicher, Hiram, Ohio, India; Miss May Hiatt, Eureka College, Japan; C. F. McCall and wife, University of Missouri and California respectively, who go to Japan; Miss Eva Raw, Hiram, to China; W. B. Alexander, Hiram College, to India; Miss Nellie Grant, India; and Chas. P. Hedges, of Bethany College, to Bolenge, Africa. These are a strong, well-trained group of young people. They will represent the Christian Church with credit in our distant fields.

F. M. Rains, S. J. Corey, Secretaries.

The church at Galesburg, Ill., recently purchased a choice lot for a new church building in the heart of the city, paying $7,200 for the property. There is a large house on the lot, which the minister, J. A. Barnett, will occupy till building operations are begun. He will take a month's vacation beginning August 10. He will lead his church in an evangelistic campaign this fall with the assistance of an evangelistic singer.

EXHAUSTION

Made Worse By Coffee Drinking.

There's a delusion about coffee which many persons, not necessarily chemists only, are fast finding out.

That exhaustion from long hours of hard mental or physical work is increased by the reaction of coffee, rather than relieved, is a well known fact. A prominent music professor found the true state of the coffee evil, and also the remedy. His wife tells his experience:

"For over thirty years my husband taught music 6 days a week and 12 to 14 hours a day. None too robust, such constant work made a drain on his strength so that he was often quite exhausted by Saturday night.

"He formed the habit of drinking strong coffee regularly with his meals. Occasionally when he did not have his coffee he would suffer from headache, nervousness and weakness. This alarmed him and me also, for we feared he was becoming a slave to coffee.

"About that time we heard of Postum and decided to try it. At first we did not like it, but soon learned it should be boiled 15 minutes after boiling commences, and then when served hot with cream and a little sugar, it was a drink fit for kings.

"My husband found he was gaining in weight while using Postum. He was rid of constipation, his headache disappeared, and his nerves became strong.

"Now at 61 he is still able to work at teaching, selling instruments or superintending the farm, and can out-work many younger men.

"He has never gone back to coffee and says he never will. Recommending Postum to others is one of his hobbies. We are happy to say all our children drink Postum and are fond of it."

MIDSUMMER KENTUCKY WORK.

Many of our preachers and active workers are away from home. By the seashore, at lake sides, along rivers, in the mountains, in the country, here, there and everywhere—some even across the ocean—our leaders are resting and pleasure seeking. This puts the work at much disadvantage. Recently in a city church very many of our best workers were conspicuous by their absence.

Our work of Kentucky Missions goes bravely on in spite of short receipts. The Secretary was busy all the month of July at home and abroad seeking to keep the work before the people. The total amount is $406.52, and of this amount $167.51 went to a special field that gave it for county work—only the remaining $239.01 being available for the payment of salaries to our corps of men. Only about one-third needed to meet the month's expenses.

W. J. Evans says that Lebanon Junction is showing some improvement.

Bardstown had J. B. Briney two Sundays and work about as usual.

South Louisville will lose Edw. B. Richey the first of September. About $800 raised recently on the debts.

Arlington Heights Mission, Lexington, has had twenty-six additions during the year. Prof. H. L. Calhoun preaches for them Sunday nights and a student supply is had for morning service.

Bromley is reported by Louis A. Kohler as showing some improvement.

Forty-five added is a part of the results of the work of D. G. Combs. He has helped in building a house of worship at Omer. It will be paid for at completion. He is now unable to preach—has to rest.

Ten added in Breathitt county by J. B. Flinchum. House to be dedicated soon that he has helped to build.

Z. Ball has added thirty-four during the month of July and Jas. Lunsford has been with him some. He had twenty-four additions.

C. M. Summers finds it necessary on account of the financial conditions to preach one Sunday elsewhere than Jackson. It is hoepd that Beattyville will use the date.

Nine added by W. L. Lacy and an active campaign ahead of him.

A. Sanders reports progress good. Ministerial association formed at Paintsville, of which he is president.

Seven added in the work of Robert Kirby in Cumberland county.

Twenty-five added by W. J. Cooke in meetings in Fleming and Garrard counties. A good month in finances for him.

Three confessions at Jellico as reported by R. G. Sherrer. Plans being made by church and preacher for future work.

Fifty added in work of J. W. Masters. Church at Harlan court house organized with forty-eight members. House to be dedicated second Sunday in September.

Fifteen added by H. L. Morgan in his southeastern Kentucky field.

A dozen added in work of J. P. Bicknell. This work in Wolfe, Morgan and Menifee counties.

Latonia does well in midsummer and Harlan C. Runyon goes right on through the heated term.

Lebanon improving house at cost of about $3,000.

Work going on as usual at Campbellsville.

H. H. Thompson pushing the work in Pike county, with hope of good results in summer and fall campaign.

Brethren of Kentucky, what kind of report shall we make at Hopkinsville as to our support of this great and inspiring work? If we are compelled to report as our books show now we will be ashamed before our brethren of Western Kentucky. We urge every church to lend a hand now.

H. W. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

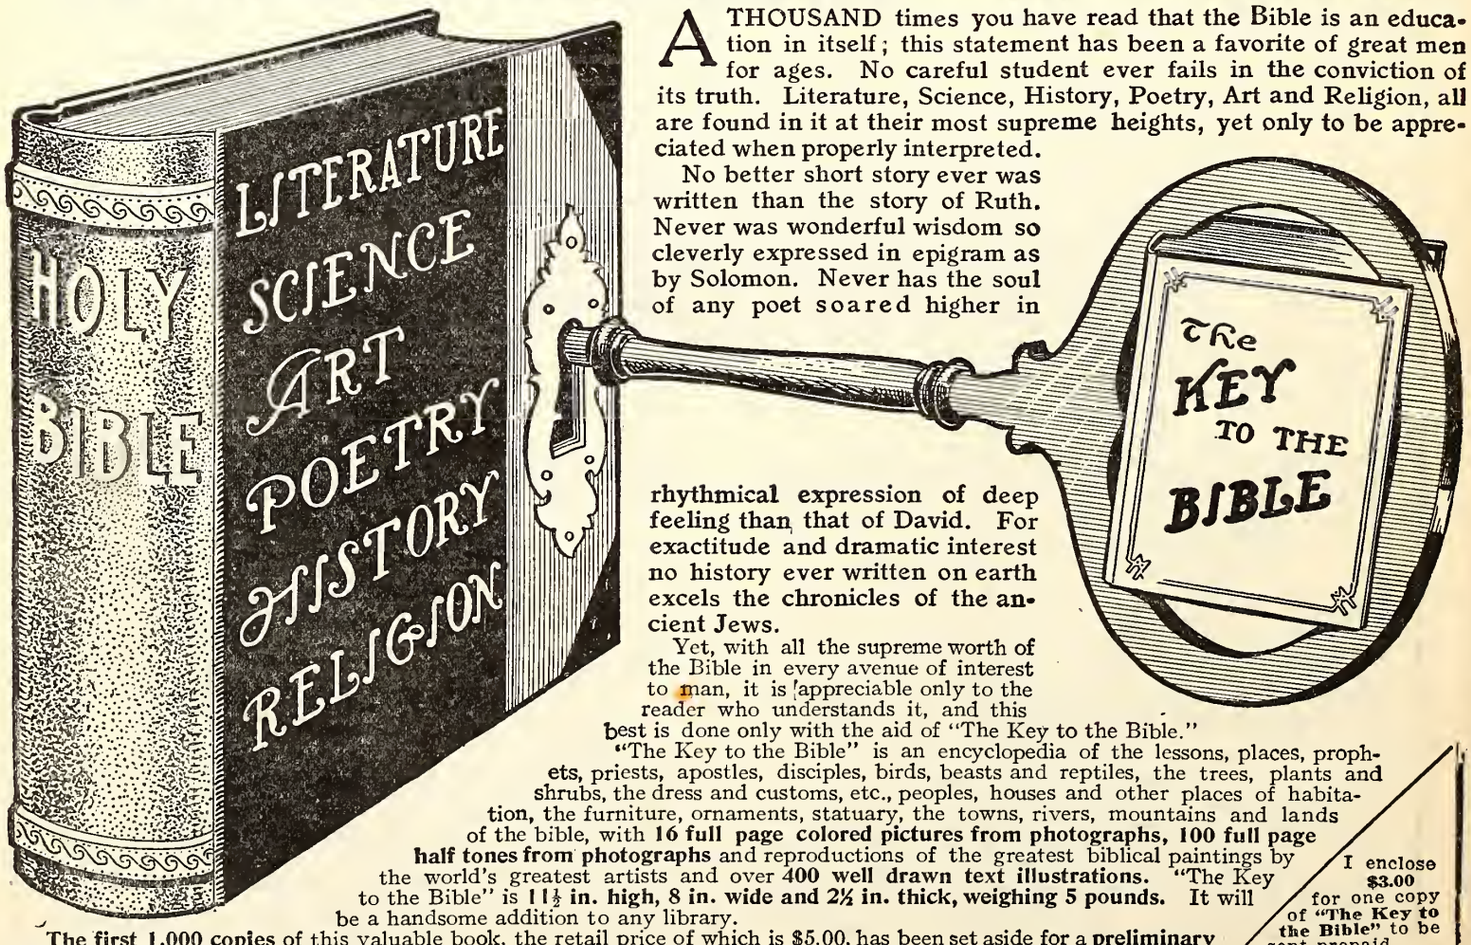
THIS MONTH ONLY---The Key to the Bible, advertised below, together with the Christian Century to a new subscriber for 6 months for Only Two Dollars.

The Greatest Book About the Greatest Book.



A THOUSAND times you have read that the Bible is an education in itself; this statement has been a favorite of great men for ages. No careful student ever fails in the conviction of its truth. Literature, Science, History, Poetry, Art and Religion, all are found in it at their most supreme heights, yet only to be appreciated when properly interpreted.

No better short story ever was written than the story of Ruth. Never was wonderful wisdom so cleverly expressed in epigram as by Solomon. Never has the soul of any poet soared higher in rhythmical expression of deep feeling than that of David. For exactitude and dramatic interest no history ever written on earth excels the chronicles of the ancient Jews.

Yet, with all the supreme worth of the Bible in every avenue of interest to man, it is appreciable only to the reader who understands it, and this best is done only with the aid of "The Key to the Bible."

"The Key to the Bible" is an encyclopedia of the lessons, places, prophets, priests, apostles, disciples, birds, beasts and reptiles, the trees, plants and shrubs, the dress and customs, etc., peoples, houses and other places of habitation, the furniture, ornaments, statuary, the towns, rivers, mountains and lands of the bible, with 16 full page colored pictures from photographs, 100 full page half tones from photographs and reproductions of the greatest biblical paintings by the world's greatest artists and over 400 well drawn text illustrations. "The Key to the Bible" is 11½ in. high, 8 in. wide and 2½ in. thick, weighing 5 pounds. It will be a handsome addition to any library.

The first 1,000 copies of this valuable book, the retail price of which is $5.00, has been set aside for a preliminary sale. We have made arrangements with the publisher for a limited number of copies, and can offer them at the Preliminary sale price of $3, prepaid to any ad. After 1,000 copies are disposed of by the publishers the price will be $5.

HELEN HUNT JACKSON'S LAST PRAYER.

Father, I scarcely dare to pray
So clear I see, now it is done,
That I have wasted half my day,
And left my work but just begun.

So clear I see that things I thought
Were right or harmless were a sin;
So clear I see that I have sought,
Unconscious, selfish aims to win.

So clear I see that I have hurt
The souls I might have helped to save;
That I have slothful been, inert,
Deaf to the calls thy leaders gave.

In outskirts of thy kingdom vast,
Father, the humblest spot give me;
Set me the lowliest task thou hast;
Let me, repentant work for Thee!

The Church and the Building.

With the returning prosperity of the advanced summer and early autumn, with the practically assured fact that the country is again entering upon an era of great industrial opportunity, whichever way the elections may go, there comes a sense of responsibility to the soul of every consecrated Disciple. Our churches, which have grown to such power of numbers need to grow also in commensurate power of effectiveness in the communities where they are placed.

No houseless church can be effective in a high degree. The experience of all the religious communions emphasizes this fact. The building must give efficiency to the work of the evangelist and missionary. A homeless congregation is only half born. Its work will hald and lag till the plant is provided in which its energies may expand and become operative.

The founders of the Church Extension Fund worked wisely, and began their labors not a moment too soon. By the instrumentality of this fund hunderds of churches are now strong and effective in their communities which could not otherwise have survived, or if they had, would have been weak and inefficient for years. No form of missionary giving has ever appealed more to the business sense of men of affairs than the work of the Board of Church Extension.

It is often said that a child cannot eat his cake and keep it too. But Church Extension has proved the falsity of that statement. The moment the money of the givers comes to the Board, it is instantly sent out to answer some one of the many calls which have received favorable consideration. It thus begins its good work at once. Yet when it is spent in this way it still remains unspent, for it is returned again after completing its helpful service, and is instantly sent out again on a similar errand. It is thus proving the unsoundness of the proverb about the cake, and is likewise demonstrating the practicability of that much derided thing called "perpetual motion." Thus Church Extension is a scientific method of startling significance, and at the same time the most helpful of agencies to the churches.

The First Sunday in September is the Red Letter Day for this offering. The churches that have adequate buildings will wish to observe it out of a sense of common duty and privilege, and also as a thank offering for their good fortune in being so well equipped for service. The churches which have old buildings and hope to rebuild, will observe the offering because their condition will make them sensitive to the problem of the unprovided. And the churches which have no buildings will most of all want fellowship in a work from which they themselves will soon need assistance.

The State Convention.

If present signs do not fail, there will be a large attendance of Illinois Disciples at the State Convention which begins August 31 and ends September 3.

One of the interesting features which promises much for our churches in this city is the plan to have our pulpits here filled by the ministers of the out-of-Chicago churches on the Sunday before the convention. Many of the congregations here are united by strong ties to one or more of the preachers in the state. As soon as the plan was proposed it was taken up with eagerness. Invitations have been sent to a number of the preachers in Illinois to occupy the pulpits of the Chicago churches on August 30.

Of course, since the number of the churches here is not great, only a few of the several hundred men in the state could be asked, and these were usually chosen upon the request of the church. In only a few cases have the churches failed to signify some marked choice. Not all of them can be accommodated, since several of the preachers are held at home over Sunday by circumstances which they cannot control. But it now seems probable that the churches of Chicago will enjoy a fine opportunity to meet the brethren from over the state on that Sunday. If possible, we hope to publish next week the list of preachers for the different pulpits.

The program of the convention, as published in the Century last week, proves that the gathering will be a notable one in the material provided by the program committee of the state board. Some of the best men in the state are to be heard, and there should be no moment of dullness from beginning to end.

The sessions are to be held in the Auditorium of the Y. M. C. A., 153 La Salle St. This is central, and will afford the delegates and visitors coming from all parts of the city equal facility of arrival at the sessions.

A special feature of the day sessions will be the noon meetings. It has long been the custom of the Y. M. C. A. to hold special lecture sessions at noon, at which the men of the business district can be present. This plan will be featured in this convention; and it is hoped that many of our members whose work might detain them from the other day meetings will come in at the noon hours.

The men's banquet on Tuesday evening, to which invitations have been sent to several hundred preachers and business men, will be one of the most interesting and helpful features of the convention.

Delegates and visitors are requested to send their names to O. F. Jordan, Evanston, Ill., for assignment to homes. A hearty invitation is extended to all Illinois Disciples.

The Best For God.

The heart has a great place, a leading place in the Christian structure. The strength or weakness of any man comes from within, from his heart. The great Alexander conquered all the known world and still because his heart was wrong, he died as the result of his own lusts. Daniel, on the other hand, stood alone, but because his heart was pure and true he came to a place of chief among the people. The church today needs more of the hearts of its people in it. If the heart of the Christian has been touched by the word of God to the proper depth the stream of love and zeal for the Lord's work will gush forth just as the copious stream of water gushes from the artesian well which has pierced the earth's fountains to the right depth. Such a well needs no pump; and the Christian heart that has been touched to the right depth needs no artificial stimulus to cause its love to flow.

Another thing which the people ought to bring into the work of the Lord in this day of startling things is originality. We follow too much in the ruts which others have worn. The Israelites brought to the temple the best they had, their finest jewels, most precious metals, costliest cloths. We should give to the work of the church as deep thought and as potent effort as he gives to the conduct of his business or profession. Every machine should be run to its full capacity. Every one of the human machines should turn out all the good of which it is capable. It should not be run beyond its capacity, however, for it is God's machine and it must be cared for properly. If the best is given the church today as the best was given by the Israelites to the temple, the kingdom of God will triumph.—E. R. Curry.

Mistakes Not Failures.

Remember this: If that bit of work which you have undertaken is for the lov of God—and it must be that—and for the glory of God, then it cannot fail. There is no such thing as failure in real Christian work. We may make mistakes, but it cannot fail, for it is God's work; and if it is done for God, when we have done our best he will take it and make use of it, perhaps so that we can see it; if not, we shall see it in the light of the world to come. He will take us as we are and our work as it is, and in the time to come perhaps make use of our very mistakes and build upon the work which we began in humble faith and quiet hope—the very work we wanted to do, but were too clumsy. There never has been yet a work for him that failed.—Bishop of Thetford.

Christian Union

Errett Gates.

FAILURE OF UNION AT ROCKFORD.

It is now well known that negotiations for the union of the First Baptist and the Central Christian churches of Rockford, Ill., have ended in failure. The statement of W. D. Ward, minister of the Christian Church, appeared recently in this paper. In confirmation of his statement, and because of the significant utterances which it contains, the statement of the pastor of the First Baptist Church is given space in this issue. It is taken from the Baptist Standard of August 1:

Statement of Baptist Pastor.

"In view of the widespread interest in the effort to secure union of Baptists and Disciples in Rockford, and the assurance expressed in The Standard so recently as July 18 that this union was to be happily consummated, the announcement that it has been abandoned may well be accompanied by some statement as to the cause.

"Generalizing broadly, I should say that there were two main contributing causes, of which the last named was, in this instance, the decisive one: namely, an impractical idealism on the part of the Disciples of Christ, and an unspiritual traditionalism on the part of many Baptists.

"I mention first the extreme tenacity with which our Disciples brethren cling to a lofty but impracticable ideal with respect to names. The good brethren of the Christian Church here in Rockford, whom these negotiations have brought us to love as well as respect, have been open to no other criticism. To what extent this criticism applies, the following illustration may show:

"On private assurances from the pastor and the chairman of their official board that the name 'First Baptist Christian Church' would probably be accepted by their people, the First Church, with two dissenting votes, inaugurated the movement committing itself to the merger. After several weeks, the First Church received the following official communication, called 'tentative' because based on an informal vote of the Central Christian Church:

" 'The members of the Central Christian Church will consider favorably an organic union with the First Baptist Church, provided all details can be adjusted satisfactorily, on the general basis that the name of the merged organization shall be "The United Baptist Christian Church," and that the members of the First Baptist Church shall pledge themselves beyond recall to change the name of 'The First Baptist Society' as soon as it can be done legally to correspond to the name of the united body.'

"On receipt of this, the First Church again voted, on April 30, 1908, with two dissenting votes, as before, as follows:

" 'Resolved, That the First Baptist Church, in a business meeting regularly called for that purpose, and by unanimous advice of its committee of conference, does hereby accept the above proposition and agrees to a merger with the Central Christian Church conformably therewith and with the constitution provided for the consolidated church by joint action of the two conference committees representing the First Baptist Church and the Central Christian Church.'

"The result was the same as before. After taking counsel with representatives of its own brotherhood, the Christian Church was unable to abide by its proposition. It did, however, commit itself formally and finally to the merger, on June 29, under the name, 'The United Church,' (with First Baptist-Central Christian as the local designation underneath), nineteen of its members voting in the negative through preference for the name 'The United Church of Christ (Baptist and Disciple).'

"There is no question but this insistence on an ideal name somewhat cooled the ardor of the Baptist brethren for union. It seemed to show more concern for the name than for the fact of a united church. The movement for union continued, however, with slightly diminished force.

"The other main contributing cause of the abandonment of this local effort for union, and the decisive one, seems to me to be traditionalism among Baptists.

"Embodied in the 'plea' for Christian union, which is the leading plank in the Disciples' platform and the real secret of their rapid increase, there is a great spiritual principle which is fast becoming dominating over Christendom, and as Rev. R. M. West lately pointed out, in his article in The Standard, is destined to supplant the divisive principles and usher in a new dispensation in Protestantism.'

"But many Baptists are still unable to recognize this principle and others are unwilling to take the first steps necessary to its practical application.

"Between bodies whose church independency is so pronounced as is that of the Baptists and the Disciples, the latter of whom have no body competent to speak except the local church, the first step to the local application of this great principle must necessarily be a merger of local churches, wherever desire and need for it exist, on some basis that conserves the essential principles of both bodies and admits of continued fellowship with both. The committee recognizes that, in the present instance, the interests of its own denomination in both these particulars, were abundantly secured by the proposed plan of union and constitution. There was no violation of Baptist doctrine and no abrogation of Baptist fellowship. They 'see no reason why it should not be regarded as a sister Baptist Church.'

"Our associational missionary committee, in its supplementary report, does object to 'dualism,' or, in other words, to mutuality. It is unwilling that this church should be a bond between the Baptists and the Disciples, enjoying and cementing their mutual fellowship and so paving the way to their ultimate mutual agreement and unification. The committee is not willing that this first step shall be taken. It either fears the dangers involved and lack of faith to believe that God can lead his people safely through these, or else they distrust the unifying principle and prefer the divisive; and, in either case, they seem to me to be following a traditional rather than a spiritual policy.

"These convictions and fears, as recently expressed freely and repeatedly, by members of the committee to members of the First Church, both in public and in private, and as finally formulated in the 'supplementary report' for presentation to the decisive meeting of the church, are responsible for a minority in the church so large as to make union impracticable.

"I hope it will be understood that this statement is made, not for the sake of criticizing or in a spirit of censure, but in order to let experience impart such wisdom as she may be judged, with some cost, to have acquired. It seems to the writer that if many of our Disciples brethren will qualify their idealism to make it more practical, and if many of our Baptist brethren will modify their traditionalism to make it more spiritual, the way will soon appear to perfect union of these fellow believers. Boardman B. Bosworth."

Rockford, Ill.

Comparing the above statement with that of W. D. Ward, which appeared in the Century of July 30, there appears no essential difference in the view of the two pastors as to the cause of failure. The failure of the two churches to unite clearly belongs, in the last analysis, to the attitude of the "missionary committee" of the Rock River Baptist Association. The members of the First Baptist Church were, in the early stages of the negotiations, unanimously in favor of the union; and if there had been no influence from the outside the union would have been consummated. The atmosphere of a Baptist church, or association is not, as a general rule, congenial to the principle of Christian union. At the present time, union spells loss to the Baptists. But more than that, the Baptists are not willing to risk loss to their denomination for the sake of union. This shows how little they are impressed with the great spiritual principle which is fast becoming dominant over Christendom.

But there are exceptions among both Baptist ministers and churches. To any one in attendance at the Baptist Congress at Baltimore last year it must have seemed as if the Baptists had become aware of Jesus' prayer for unity, and felt a positive obligation resting upon them to help answer it. This was the impression made by the utterances of such representative Baptists as Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Dr. Frank M. Goodchild, Dr. C. H. Dodd and others. With these men speaking for the principle of Christian union with no uncertain sound, in the papers and councils of the Baptists they are destined to share with all other Christian peoples in the work of bringing in a united Church of God.

Dr. Bosworth's statement concerning the Rockford movement should be allowed to speak for itself. It is fearless, candid and brotherly. No one who knows him doubts for a moment the sincerity and unselfishness of his motive, or the largeness and catholicity of his spirit. Both his physical stature and his spiritual vision tower above small men and small minds. His words should be carefully read and weighed by Baptists and Disciples alike.

IN THE TOILS OF FREEDOM

BY ELLA N. WOOD

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER VIII.

One Day of Freedom.

The autumn leaves fell about Jean and rustled in his path as he trudged to the breaker, but he did not see them. A great purpose was forming in his mind and he had neither eyes nor ears for the things about him. The few weeks at school had fired him with the desire to know more and there was but one way to do this and that was to get away from the breaker and the mines. He had proved himself an expert in the breaker and had been offered the position, first as bell boy, then as driver, but had refused both for he well knew that if he once went down in the mines to work he would spend his whole life there, and he had determined to get away from the life that bound him to drudgery and ignoranee. He would go at onee so that he could get something to do and some kind of a home before winter.

His last day in the breaker was spent just as all the others had been. At its close he went to the offiee and reeeived his cheek in payment, whieh he took home and gave to his father, as he had always done. All through the evening he followed his mother around, helping now and then with the little things about the house. They had becone very elosely attaehed to each other sinee Laddie's death, and Jean longed to tell her that he was going to leave, but eould not. The only way was to go in the night. He knew that if he told his parents they would not object, but he could not find the eourage and so bade them good night in the old familiar way.

Jean did not dare allow himself to sleep, for he knew he would not awaken till morning if he did; so he got his little bundle of elothes ready and then gazed long out of the window. If he had needed anything to strengthen his purpose, the view before him would have been sufficient. This part of the town was called "The Black Acre" by the town's people and it well deserved its name. Around him were the miners' eottages, looking smaller and more gloomy in the darkness. A few bloeks away stood the textile mills, and as he listened to the throbbing of the maehinery, he pietured the little girls busy at their night work. They would labor till daylight in the morning, then their plaees would be filled by other ehildren who would work through the long day.

Beyond the factory the great culm heaps loomed up like blaek mountains; to the right of these was the breaker. The breaker! How the old bitterness stirred Jean's heart as he looked at it and thought of the weary years he had spent there, then of Laddie, and of the day he had walked beside the stretcher which carried Nelson home. No wonder that he uneonseiously elinched his fists as though he would strike it down.

At the left he eould cateh a glimpse of the electrie lights of the town with its churches and schools and happy girls and boys. Then he thought of Evelyn. Would he ever see her again? As if afraid his purpose would weaken, he jumped up and listened. Making sure that his parents were asleep he took his bundle of elothes and the dinner-pail which his mother had filled for his luneh the next day and quietly left the house, taking the road that led past the Crossets, for he wanted to see Penny before he left. The window was open and Jean spoke his name. Penny was not long in making his appearance.

"Penny, I'm goin' away," said Jean.

Penny eould not grasp the situation. For a moment he looked at Jean, then at his dinner pail and bundle.

"Where to, Jean?"

"I don't know; anywhere to get away from Minington. I'm goin' to see if I ean't get a chance to go to school.

"Oh, Jean, that's great. Lem'me go, too."

"No, Penny, you can stay here and go to school. You don't have to work in the breaker like I do."

"It'll be awful lonesome without you, Jean, there's no one else I like half so well."

"Penny, I wish you would be good to mither after I'm gone. Go up and see her once in a while, and carry in the wood for her sometimes."

"Bet yer boots I will, Jean. She's a mighty fine lady."

Jean swallowed hard and was glad it was dark so Penny could not see the tears that would come in spite of him. He knew he must start at once or his courage would all be gone, so he turned away from the window and his "Good-bye, Penny," sounded low and unnatural as his form disappeared in the darkness.

He took the road leading out of Minington and walked most of the night. The farther he got from the breaker the lighter his heart beeame. The old, hampered feeling seemed to drop from him and when the sun came up over the eastern hills, a feeling of freedom and buoyancy took possession of him. He elimbed the fenees and went through the woods and meadows; he shouted and sang, and ran and leaped, giving full vent to all the boyish feelings that swelled in his heart. Every stream he eame to he would wash in the elear water, trying to remove the grime of the mines from his hands and face, and wondering if it would ever eome off and if his hands would ever look like other people's. His nails were worn far baek and his fingers stubbed and blunted from picking the slate out of the coal. He remembered how they used to bleed and get so sore, but that was long ago and they had long since become hardened to the work.

How short the day was! Jean wondered why it had been so mueh shorter than the days he had spent in the breaker. Towards evening he came to a town. He had the $2 that had been given him by Mr. Harper for pumping the organ, and thought he would take a train there and go as far as his money would let him. The station agent told him that a train went east at 9:40, and sold him a ticket to Maple Hill, N. J. Jean reaehed there about midnight, and being very tired and sleepy asked leave to stay in the station until morning, and threw himself on a bench and went to sleep.

The sun was shining in his faee when he awoke and he was hungry, for he had eaten all his lunch the day before, so with 10 cents that was left after buying his ticket, he purchased some sandwiches and started out to inquire for work, but his courage failed him as he thought of his hands and faee, and he passed store after store until he had gone elear through the town and out again into the country.

Towards noon, while passing a farmhouse, he saw an old man digging potatoes in a garden. By this time he was almost famished, so he went up to the fence and waited until the old man slowly straightened his back, and seeing him, said, "Well, I swan! Whose boy be you?"

"My name is Kirklin, sir, and I would like to help dig your potatoes."

"Kirklin? Does your pa live in these parts?"

"No, sir," replied Jean, "my father lives in Minington."

"So you came all the way from Minington to help old Eben Hainer dig potatoes, did you?"

Jean was a little taken back at this, but said that he would like to try his hand at it. Just then a woman appeared at the kitchen door and called, "Eb-e-e-n, come to dinner."

"Well, I like the sound of that purty well, how does it sound to you, young man?"

Jean laughed. "I would like to earn my dinner, Mr. Hainer, I have no money to buy one."

"Well you come up to the house with me and I will introduce you to my woman and we'll see what she says about it."

Jean received a pleasant welcome from the motherly old lady. She told him to go right out to the pump and wash, and hustled back into the kitchen to get a clean towel. During the meal they drew from Jean most of his history and it brought forth numerous exclamations from Mr. Hainer of, "Well, I swan!" and "I never heern tell of the like."

When Jean had finished his story, Mr. Hainer sat for awhile in a deep study, while his wife wiped her eyes on the corner of her apron. At last he said, "I swan, I wish't I could keep you myself, but I jest ean't do it. Tell you what, though, I'm going to drive over to Crystallville tomorrow, and I believe you ean get work there in the glass faetory. Anyway, stay with us till morning and I'll give you a lift to town."

In the afternoon Jean helped Mr. Hainer dig potatoes, and at night was given his supper and then shown up to a tidy bed-room.

"Hello! Got sumpin' stunnin' to tell yer. Beteher can't guess what happened las' night," shouted Penny from his perch on the hitching post in front of Dr. Hathaway's house early the next morning, as Evelyn eame out to get the morning paper. He had been waiting patiently for her to appear so as to be the first to tell her of Jean's departure.

"Why, good morning, Penny, what has brought you out so early?"

"Sumpin' dreadful happened las' night. Guess."

"Oh, I don't know, Penny, did the factory burn?"

"Nope, guess agin."

"Anybody dead? Tell me quick, Penny."

"Worse'n that; Jean's gone."

"Jean gone? Why, what do you mean? Gone where?"

"Cleared right out in de middle ob de night, so's he won't have to work in de breaker no more. He said how he was goin' to git a lot o' learnin' an' be a man like yo pappy, an' tole me to take eare of his mother."

Penny straightened up and looked quite important as he made this statement.

"But, Penny, has he gone away for good, and won't he come to say his lesson any more?"

"Yep, gone fur good."

Evelyn's hands went up to her face and she began to cry. Jean was her favorite of all the children she had tried to help, and her tender, childish heart was touched as she realized that he had indeed left them.

"Oh, gee, Evelyn, don't cry! Why, it's just bully! I jes' hollered and turned summ'r sets all over the front yard this mornin' to think he don't have to work in that giddy ole breaker again. But then I s'pose girls has got to cry," and Penny began skipping stones regardless of Evelyn's grief.

Evelyn soon dried her tears. "I am glad, Penny, but then it seems so awful to think he is out in the big world alone. Does his mother know it?

"Yep. Was up there and toted her wood in an hour ago an' she said she was glad he was away from the coal shadder, an' she 'lowed he'd grow to be a fine man, for his gran'pap in Scotland had been smart'n anybody. She cried, though."

"I'm going to tell mamma and we will go right up and see poor Mrs. Kirklin, for I know she feels awful bad."

Evelyn hurried into the house. Penny watched the door close, then turned a double handspring and said, "Girls is queer, shore 'nuf."

Hugh and Maidie sat alone at the breakfast table. Jean was gone. When Maidie went to call him for breakfast that morning she found his bed undisturbed and a little note, printed in cramped, rude letters, pinned to the pillow.

"dear mother," was what she read, "i cant stan the mine any longer an im goin away i dont know where to but i got to try to go to school i hate to lev you an father i will try an be good an i luv you good by jean."

Maidie read the note over and over, growing more and more bewildered all the time. She looked again at the empty bed, then started to the kitchen, where Hugh was making ready for breakfast.

"Oh, Hughie! the lad is gone and I found this on the pillow. What can it mean?"

Hugh took the note and read it.

"It means, lass, that the boy has left us."

"Left us? You canna mean, Hughie, that he won't come back tonight just as he always has!"

Maidie's face grew white and tense as it began to dawn on her that Jean had really left them and gone away from Minington, perhaps forever.

"Maidie, lass, don't look like that. The lad will be all right and it may be the very best thing he can do."

Hugh put his arm around Maidie and led her into the next room and placed her in a chair.

"I have seen it coming; he has been fighting it out for over a year. Jean will never be satisfied till he can get an education and that is what he has started out for."

At last the tears came and the little mother cried bitterly while her husband talked on and tried to comfort her.

"He is such a little fellow, Hughie, I just can't bear to think of him out in the world alone."

"He won't have to work any harder than he did here, that's one thing sure, and once away from the breaker he may get a chance to go to school."

"Hughie, let's just put him in God's care."

Maidie had dried her tears and looked up at Hugh with confidence and trust.

"But oh, how I'll miss my bonny boy. They're all gone now, Hughie."

She slipped down on her knees with her head against Hugh, and together they asked God to keep and guide their boy.

Reasonableness of Faith.

By W. C. Bitting.

"I believe." Mark 9:24.

Many persons think that faith is credulity for the incredible, a delusion that the unreal is real, the untrue true, and the irrational trustworthy. That may be the creed of superstition, but the religion of Jesus spurns such dogmas. Some who dream that they are religious may even oppose faith and reason. They err. Nothing is more rational than faith in the sense in which Jesus uses the term.

A babe is born today. Faith in each other made the marriage from which the little life came. The infant's soul is only a sponge. It begins a life of receptivity. Childhood learns by absorption. It is wicked to deceive a boy or girl precisely because we rely upon its faith for its training. All its education rests on faith in parents, friends, teachers, the testimony of experts in all realms. It trusts itself and others. It banks upon its senses. It is shocked into suspicion only by assaults on its faith in those previously trusted. It is saved by faith everywhere and always, saved from ignorance into culture by faith in educational processes and persons; saved from loneliness into social joys by faith in friends; saved from poverty to wealth by faith in business, banks, and the commercial processes of life; saved from anarchy to the glorious blessings of such a republic as ours only by faith in law, and its administration, and guarantees. Faith makes a man, and makes society.

The absolute rationalist is a man of faith. He shows it when he marries, when he puts his gold in the bank, or buys a bond, when he boards a railroad train or a steamboat, when he accepts a check, when he swallows medicine, when he gives a power of attorney, when he quotes a scientific authority, when he goes to bed, when he reads a newspaper, when he uses the apparatus in laboratory or observatory, and everywhere else. If some omnipotent devil could tonight rob mankind of faith, he would wake the world tomorrow to break up every home, to smash business and its credit system, to wreck government with anarchy, to tear up every check and greenback and security, to stop the wheels of every transportation facility, to make skeptics of every student, to cause chaos generally. The world would turn to hell in a second without faith. It is the most rational disposition we have, the most universal asset of humanity, the only guarantee of order in home, school, state and commerce. Destroy confidence and every man is only a scornful interrogation mark, and society becomes disintegrated into an archepelago with no isthmuses to pierce the stormy seas of individual distrust.

We believe. That is the surest fact of life. And we believe and trust and have faith in husbands and wives, children and teachers, banks and corporations, witnesses and scientific experts, friends and customers, servants and masters, doctors and lawyers, cars, boats, rails and horses, simply because they deserve to be trusted. We discovered that by experience. They are worthy of our faith. Cynics are few and lonely.

Christ asks us only for the same sort of faith in him that we give to all the factors of life about us. He asks us to have that identical faith in himself in the moral realm that we have in all these other realms. And for precisely the same reason. He deserves it, is worthy of it. The same experiment that has made us sure that faith is justified in our fellows, will also prove that faith in him is equally justified. Religion is not the great exception. Why is it rational for us to have faith in all other regions of life, and irrational for us to have it in the spiritual?

The secret of unbelief in Christ is that men do not know him. Nor do they care for their spiritual natures. The orbit of ideals for most of us is the rim of a silver dollar. We worship two gods—Mammon by daylight, and Pleasure by electric light. We toil all day to make a wage, and sit up all night to spend it. Christ has no immediate financial value. Were we consistent beings we would care for our moral natures also, and with the same faith we use in making ourselves successful heathens, would come to the trustworthy Christ and say, "Lord, I believe."

UNION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES.

A good many of us Baptists out here in the Northwest are interested in this union movement. We hope it will gain in favor and become general because we believe that thereby there will be great gain to the cause of Christ, and no sacrifice of anything except sentiment and prejudice.

Baptists certainly have nothing to fear in such union, though, of course, words of caution and conservatism from some of the brethren are not amiss, if not too strong. Baptists are the stronger body and their best and strongest leaders should help to lead and guide the movement which we hope will not down.

There is no need of any new schism, or new denomination growing out of this move, which is a wonderfully popular movement, both inside the church and outside. Our brethren who may be inclined to criticise the action of certain churches, should not be too severe, for it might not help matters much, and we recall that if certain Baptist brethren had been a little more charitably inclined, the schism of 1826 in the Red Stone Association might not have taken place or if it did, might not have grown to its present proportions.

The union of the Lord's people when it can be done right, is certainly desirable. If churches which have so united take the name Church of Christ it does not appear that we need change our principles in the least.

We have been considering this matter here. We have a city of 17,500 people, and growing fast. The Disciples number 700 members, the Baptists 500 members. Both churches are now building $40,000 houses and both are planning to push their mission work into the suburbs and surrounding valleys.

The writer was one of the Baptist committee, and with others, was in favor of doing something, though we had not the precedent, we would have now. But more conservative brethren prevailed, and the matter was dropped. But what a saving there could have been of men and money. We could have had a good house of worship, one on the east side, and one on the west side; and we could have united in our mission work in this most wonderful, and fruitful valley. As it is now, we shall probably unite in a large part of our mission work and we thank God it is getting so that we shall not be considered rank heretics if we do.

A good many of us wish our Baptist brethren would help in this movement; it means so much to the cause of our Christ all through the West. We do not want a new denomination, surely in this age we can introduce new methods of advancing the cause of Christ without any new schisms, and especially when we are in accord with the prayer of Jesus for his disciples, "that they all may be one."

"Vaccination Against Religion."

(By Earle Marion Todd.)

An interesting sidelight is thrown on the present discussion on evangelism among the Disciples by an address by Dr. A. S. Peake, the brilliant young theologian of the new Manchester university, before the Primitive Methodist lay preachers at Wesley's Chapel, London, on June 25.

The English Primitive Methodists have grown into a highly "respectable" religious body. Some of their own members are sadly lamenting this fact, which they regard as a sure sign of degeneracy and a serious handicap in the prosecution of their work. Even the younger men can remember the time when they were freely called "Ranters" and were looked down on by "respectable" people very much as the Salvation Army is today. The denomination is an offshoot from Wesleyanism, being the result of a rebellion against the arrogant officialism of that eminently respectable body, on the part of a few Cheshire and Lancashire preachers who believed in open-air preaching. Their earlier preachers were uneducated men, but were among the most earnest and self-sacrificing men that English Christianity has produced. The present strength of the denomination is due to the tireless energy and unconquerable devotion of those early preachers, who went everywhere through the country districts preaching the gospel and establishing churches. These churches, whose very existence is a protest against the gross neglect of their duties by the sporting parsons of a generation ago, are the ones which the Anglican church is now endeavoring to crush by the tyrannical education act passed by the late conservative government.

Primitive Methodism was born in evangelism, and has thriven on evangelism, and has paid, up to the present, but little attention to anything beyond. Now, however, some of her more devoted sons are seeing that if she is to hold her own in the changed conditions of the times on which we are entering she must adapt her message and her methods to those conditions, and must furthermore regard evangelism as the beginning and not the end of her endeavor. Dr. Peake is one of the most brilliant of the younger English theologians. Trained at Mansfield College, Oxford, under Principal Fairbairn, he has rapidly risen to the very front rank as a scholar and writer. He and Dr. Denny recently had a battle-royal over the question of the Atonement, which brought the young Manchester professor no little distinction.

Speaking to the lay preachers of his denomination, still a mighty force in English Methodism, Dr. Peake, as reported in the Christian World, urged his hearers to cultivate the teaching as well as the prophetic function of the preacher. They should place the doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood where Jesus placed it—in the very center of their theology. The lay preacher must understand the Bible. They were to preach the same Gospel as their fathers, but it did not follow that in nailing their flag to the mast they would use precisely the same nails and fix it in exactly the same place as their fathers did. Preaching had to fulfill two functions—the teaching and the prophetic ministry. No church could live upon evangelism alone. They had seen the results of trying to live upon it. They often saw how a great revival in which hundreds perhaps had been brought into the Kingdom of God had had a most lamentable sequel. Unless they supplemented the prophetic ministry by a teaching ministry, the last state of that church was likely to be worse than the first. There was the question of not only, "Are you going to make your congregation Christians?" but "What kind of Christians are you going to make them? What sort of life are you going to make in your churches? At what temperature is it to be lived? "Enthusiasm was a spasmodic thing. It came and it went. They must do something to preserve a steady and an abiding glow. There was such a thing as vaccinating people against religion. This was one of the things that troubled him with reference to children's missions. He had a horror of this thing happening in some cases—that they lightly and superficially affected the life of a child with religion and made it more difficult at a later stage to bring about a satisfactory work of grace. He did not believe in a conversion unless it went to the very roots of a man's nature.

The Disciples are not the only ones who are seeking after a saner, broader and deeper evangelism. While some of the religious bodies are only just awakening to the importance of evangelism at all, and some are still in the midst of their Rip Van Winkle sleep, the problem of others is the lesser problem of efficiency, and of recognizing the importance of the things that have been "left undone".

"What's your occupation, bub?" asked a visitor at the Capitol of a bright boy whom he met in the corridor. The boy happened to be a page in the White House. "I'm running for congress, sir," he replied.—Christian Intelligencer.

Lesson XII. The Wisdom Books.

Most nations have among their writings some that deal with the explanation of the universe, the consideration of the world order, the problems of human life. Such books are usually called philosophy, the devotion to a rational treatment of the world and of being. Among the Greeks this was a favorite study, and produced some of the most fruitful of their literature. The Hebrews also had books of this character, and some of them are preserved in the Old Testament.

The Hebrew writings differed from the Greek, however, in the fact that they were always practical rather than speculative. They considered special problems of human experience, such as prosperity and failure, suffering, doubt and the like. The general term which they used to describe these pursuits was "Wisdom." By this they understood both the qualities of discretion, prudence, insight, self-control, and as well the results of these in a wisely ordered and happy life. Thus wisdom was both the subjective source of happiness and its outward reward.

The Book of Proverbs is a collection of the wise and witty sayings of Israel. Proverbs are both the result of popular experience coined into brief, pregnant sentences by passing from mind to mind, and also the product of reflection and artistic construction by individual sages. Solomon was the traditional "wise man" of ancient Israel, and the collection was assigned to him by the later Jews. It is apparent, however, from the structure and headings of the various parts of the book, that many hands and minds wrought at the work of compilation. Perhaps the oldest portion of the collection is the section 10:1-22:16; which is described as the "proverbs of Solomon." Next in order would come 25-29, a later group, whose work was associated with the times of Hezekiah. 22:17-24 consists of two short additions or appendices. 1-9 forms an editorial introduction to the collection as thus far gathered, and 30, 31 are perhaps the latest additions to the volume. The dates of the various parts are thus seen to cover, in all probability, a wide period of time. The book hardly took its present form before the late post-exilic age.

The Book of Job is a discussion of the question, "Why do the righteous suffer?" The easy philosophy which insisted that the good are always prosperous and the evil in trouble broke down as the nation sunk deeper into the disasters of the exilic and later times. In such an age the problem of individual suffering became more and more acute. The author of this book, the greatest literary artist ever produced by this nation, and it might well be added by any nation, sought to throw light on the question by using the story of an ancient sufferer whose life of wisdom and piety gave no warrant for such an experience. In order to involve the character in this tragedy, the satan, or adversary, who still appears as one of the sons of God, undertakes to test the man's fidelity. Afflictions are sent upon him without result, save to deepen in his heart the despairing wonder at the perversity of his experience and the silence of God. His three friends, who conclude from his misfortunes that he is an unrepentant sinner, are silenced at last, and Job is vindicated. The answer to the problem was not final, but it has been of great value. In a word, it is that the cause of trouble cannot always be known, but the soul triumphs by holding fast its faith in God. The date was post-exilic.

Ecclesiastes is perhaps the most surprising book in the Bible. Its tone is so frankly pessimistic and sceptical that it was not admitted to the canon till very late. It was a product of the late Persian or Greek period, when speculation concerning the value of life and the probabilities of the future was rife in Jewish circles. It uses the figure of King Solomon as a thin veil for the opening of the discussion, but this figure is soon abandoned. The reflections of the author show him to be a man of culture, convinced that human effort and experiment are largely in vain, and that the best wisdom is found in appreciative enjoyment of the blessings which God bestows. The profound melancholy and questioning of the book are at times relieved, as at the close, by more hopeful and positive views, which may be the corrective comments of later hands. The date was perhaps 350 B. C.

The Song of Songs, if entitled to a place in the wisdom literature at all, must be interpreted as a drama attempting to prove that there is a love so true that no flattery can seduce it and no gold can buy it. The dramatic interpretation is, however, much questioned and many believe it to be a collection of love and marriage songs, used in the "wedding week."

The Prayer-Meeting.

Silas Jones.

Topic, September 2., Ps. 84.

The intense delight of the psalmist in the house of Jehovah is incomprehensible to millions of American citizens. To them attendance upon the worship of the church is intolerable rather than absence from it. Baseball, golf, and the Sunday paper have far more significance for them than the house of the Lord. Many whose names are on the church roll seldom appear to join in the worship, and when they do come to church, thoughts of the Sunday dinner are more prominent in their minds that considerations of fellowship with God and his people. The presence of such indifference tempts the devout soul to denunciation of athletics and the newspapers. But the good that comes from denouncing these things is hard to discover. The business of the church is to show men their need of its ministrations. In other words, the church must make itself necessary to the life of the nation. Those who delight in it now have been its beneficiaries. If they are tempted to forsake its assemblies, they at once realize that separation from the church would be their immeasurable loss.

A beautiful building is an aid to worship. Ugliness has nothing commendable in it. It is praiseworthy in a man to go where his conscience is free, even if he must turn away from the great cathedral and meet with his brethren in a dingy chapel. After the first disciples were driven from the temple at Jerusalem they had no place set apart for the specific purposes of religion. We honor them for their sacrifices. But we can build attractive houses of worship. Shall we meet in halls and in ramshackle buildings on back alleys because our spiritual ancestors could not afford or were forbidden by law to build attractive houses for their meetings? There seem to be a few among us yet who reason in this fashion. The man on the street has another view of the situation. He knows we have money enough to put up the right kind of building and he despises us if we do not. In his opinion love of money is concealed under the guise of a preference for simplicity in worship. The children should associate religion with what is beautiful. Along with our denunciations of the comic (?) pictures in the Sunday papers should go denunciation of unsightly church walls and church yards. Reformation, as well as charity, has its proper beginning at home.

A church building should represent the sacrifices of Christian people. It should speak to every one who knows how it was erected of genuine devotion on the part of those whose message it declares. It sometimes happens that a building tells a story of extortion. Men have been forced to give money for its construction. When they look upon it, they associate it with nagging, rather than the virtues of Christianity. And this brings us to the question of Church Extension. If there is any town or city in this world where the Disciples of Christ ought to have a house of worship and the members living there are not able of themselves to build it, we ought to see to it that they have the money necessary. We should feel ashamed to allow our brethren to be handicapped in the doing of the work appointed for them. They will get help from their neighbors much more easily if it is known that they do not stand alone, that they have not been deserted by their fellow disciples. They will be stimulated to greater endeavors by a consciousness of a faith shared by a great company of earnest spirits. The brotherhood of man will be more than a name to them.

The Cure for Worry.

Worry has been called "Americanitis." But that is a slander. No country is immune from the disease. Neither is any class of society; rich and poor, learned and ignorant, capitalist and laborer —all are subject to its ravages. Work rarely kills, but worry, sooner or later, brings down its victim. A man can least afford to worry when he does worry, because just at such a time he needs the force of every faculty to bring him to his normal condition.

What is worry, anyway? It is just a host of restless imps and fear, which, taken singly, could be conquered with hardly an effort. It is their multiplicity, their persistency, that discourages. How may worry be cured?

First, by realizing the utter uselessness of worry. A dozen eternities spent in worry will not change a single fact. It is only by hard, faithful work that such things are accomplished, and no man can work well, with a clear head and a steady hand, if he will persist in worrying.

Second, by taking a larger view of life. Most of us imagine that the world is comprehended within our own limited horizon. That is not quite true. There are really some good people, and some good things beyond the line of our vision.

Third, by not "crossing bridges" until we come to them. As a matter of fact, nine-tenths of our fears are never realized. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Fourth, not only by remembering that tomorrow has not yet arrived, but that yesterday is already past.

Fifth, by constantly recalling that this is God's world. It has not yet gone to the devil. It may at times seem as though it had, but the presence of so many strong, good people in it, and the constant progress that we are making, disprove it.—New York Observer.

Where Truth is Found.

The deepest truth that life can bring
Is written on each common thing.
We find the lore we all must learn
With the friend we love, the bread we earn,
Concealed, revealed in old and new,
The God doth evermore shine through.

Impedimenta.

By Robert Woods Van Kirk.

A vandal host upcrawls with cumbrous weight
In tortuous course from lowland on to plain,
Through narrow pass of rugged mountain chain—
Its lust for ultra-montane wealth to sate;
And but for guardiance of the army's freight
Of food and arms—a lumbering baggage-train—
The soldiers to their booty fain
Would rush, exultant in so rich a fate.

So would the ardent soul with hasty stride
Mount quickly to the goal and seize the prize—
Nor fear a foe, nor moment halt for guide—
But that the body's frailties in the guise
Of hunger, racking pain, disease and thirst,
Cling to the soul like cross to one accurst.

THE NEGRO IN THE SOUTH. His Economic Progress in Relation to His Moral and Religious Development, by Booker T. Washington and W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. Pub. by Geo. W. Jacobs and Co. of Philadelphia. Price, $1.

Mr. Washington writes two chapters of this very interesting and informing volume. Both are on the economic development of the negro, the one on that before emancipation and the other on that since. They are written in his usual perspicuous and entertaining style and are very practical in their applications. He accepts the conditions that confront his people and would pursue the methods of evolution in elevating them to the coveted goal of success in culture and civilization by the side of the advanced white race.

Mr. Du Bois writes a chapter each on the economic revolution in the south and on religion in the south. He is more academic than is Prof. Washington and reveals the scholar in his researches and in the style of his discourse. He is revolutionary and has the spirit of the old abolitionist. He would demand every privilege of the whites whether prepared for it or not, claiming that they are human privileges and inherent by right.

The book is itself an eloquent testimony to the possibilities of the negro in that it reveals two master minds of that race and gives confidence that they will raise up leaders who will deliver them from every form of bondage whether of ignorance and incapacity or imposed by prejudice and custom. Overcoming Depression.

Depression is not to be overcome by fighting it. To forget all about it, in the expression of the best gifts we have, even though they may not be remarkable, will put depression so out of mind that it will not need to be fought. A kind word to a friend will do more to lift the cloud of one's own depression than hours of a mere effort of the will to overcome the gloom. Expression of one's best is the best cure for depression that gives ascendancy to one's worst.—Sunday School Times.

ONE OF GOD'S ERRAND BOYS.

S. G. Inman.

The congregation at La Rosita, Coahuila, is one of the most remarkable of our Mexican churches. When the town began its existence something over two years ago, our work was commenced there. A church was organized in a few months, due principally to the untiring efforts of the sainted Zamorano, a miner who occupied even his noon hours in preaching the gospel to his fellow workmen. Before being burned to death in the mine, he could count a dozen of his converts in the little church. Among these was a father and mother and five boys, the two oldest and the parents being members of the church. The oldest, sixteen, copies parts of the gospels on paper and carries them with him in the mine when he goes to work to read them to others. His experiences are most interesting.

But it is Lorenzo, his younger brother, who died a few weeks ago, that this story is about. His was one of the first confessions we were privileged to take at La Rosita. But his parents wanted him to wait awhile for his baptism, as he was only eleven years old. But he insisted so strongly that he knew what it meant to be a Christian, that permission was finally given him to take this step. Some months afterward he became an invalid, and all during his sickness he showed a faith and appreciation of Christ's love which is very seldom equaled in children whose families have known Christ for generations before. None of the church members or the minister ever came to see him that he did not ask them to sing and pray with him, his favorite hymns being: "Mi Redentor el Rey de Gloria" (My, Redeemer, the King of Glory) and "Cerca de Ti Senor" (Nearer My God to Thee). When his mother would pray with him, he would say to her: "Mamma, do not pray that I may get well. Pray that God's will may be done. That's the way Jesus prayed."

The last afternoon of his life he went off into a long sleep. When he awoke he said to his mother: "I have been away off. I had to go on an errand for God. I have just come back to see you a little while, for God wants me to do errands for Him all the time. Pretty soon a beautiful coach is coming to take me away." A few hours later he called all the family together, and told them that he would now have to leave them. He begged his mother not to cry for, "I am not your boy, now, Mamma. I am going to be God's boy." Then, in words that reminded his parents of the farewell of Jesus to His disciples, he began speaking to each one of his brothers about their lives, urging them to be faithful to Christ and to obey father and mother. Then he spoke to his parents. He had seen them grow impatient with each other at times. He begged them not to do this any more but to love one another, and help each other to be good Christians. "And now I must leave you," he said. "Here comes that beautiful coach for me. O, it moves so silently and beautifully. It will come for all of you too, after awhile, but not now." And he threw back the cover and made as if to enter the coach. His mother took his little wasted form in her arms, and he whispered, "Dios mio," but his voice failed, and his father, recognizing a favorite text, repeated for him, "Ten miserieordia de mi" (My God, have mercy upon me). The little lips moved in a vain endeavor to follow his father. But no sound was heard. He passed from his mother's arms into the awaiting coach of heaven.

Is it worth while—all this spending of men and money, that His little ones in the dark lands may be led into His light? You, fathers and mothers, reply, supposing that this had been your boy. Is the simple gospel not adaptable to the superstitious and color-loving Latin American? Then you, friend critic, explain this twelve year old boy's faith, who had heard so little time before of his Saviour's love, and show us how it is that this mother could say that if God restored her son to her she would be so much more faithful, and that if He took him, she would have to be still more faithful that she might meet him in the heavenly home.

HOW NEW ORLEANS WILL FEED OUR DELEGATES.

In addition to furnishing food for the mind and a balm for the eye, the charming old Creole City appeals with peculiar force to the man or woman with a good appetite.

History is strident with rotund tales of the gourmet; we are told of the red mullet and the tongue of the peacock served with cucumbers, and seed pearls on the table of Nero; of the humming bird brains served with sauce piquante and flanked with the eyeballs of the scarlet flamingo to tempt the sated appetites of Lucullus and Epicurus and the kindred gourmets who dallied about the feasts in the halycon days of Rome, when slave-fed ichthyological specimens gave up their ghosts and the nations of the earth furnished their quota of viands for the tables crowned with the redolent wine from the vintage of the known world; but none of these things so rejoice the jaded stomach as a fillet of beef a la Mignonne, or a tenderloin a la Richelieu, or a stew or river shrimp a la Creole, and a hundred other wonderful and appetizing dishes concocted and served by the chefs of New Orleans at the principal restaurant of the city.

The various delicacies which characterize our cooking in all sections of this great country pale into insignificance before the mellow pleasures of a Creole breakfast or dinner, in which the dainty aroma of admirably mingled condiments spurs the appetite, before the dishes with their smoking contents regale the hungry ones in fact.

It is not only in the materials but also in the manner in which they are prepared by the cook that enables the chef of the Creseent City to smile in disdain over the clumsy efforts of his ancient prototypes, and adds a peculiar charm to the restaurants of this great metropolis where the ambitious Chef de Cuisine delights to set before his admiring patrons, not only on the feast days, but every day, his piquant and attractive concoctions through which New Orleans has achieved the enviable distinction of being the "One City" in the United States in which the appetite receives a prompt and just attention, and where it is possible to secure a most enjoyable repast at a moderate outlay.

Another very interesting fact to our people is the very moderate cost of living in New Orleans, where special rates have been given for our International Missionary Convention, October 9-15, 1908.

If you have lost your appetite,
Or health has taken wing,
Come this way in your weary flight,
For here they write and sing,
Where Art and Nature expedite
The search for life's sweet spring.

CORNER STONE EXERCISE OF THE MISSIONARY TRAINING SCHOOL AT INDIANAPOLIS AUG. 10, 1908.

A thoroughly representative gathering of five hundred Disciples from all over Indiana and from many other states was present at the corner stone exercises of the Sarah Davis Detering Memorial Missionary Training School at Irvington on August 10. The day was ideal, and every feature of the occasion went to impress those present with the importance of this advance move in our missionary work.

As was said by Mrs. Cunningham, president of the Indiana C. W. B. M., "This school is the gift of our woman's organization to the brotherhood. It is to train our youth for increased service and efficiency in all our fields." In keeping with this thought, President McLean of the Foreign Society and Secretary Wright of the American Society gave most helpful and inspirational addresses.

President McLean declared that the building under erection was a prophecy of better things among the Disciples of Christ. "Other corner stones will be laid," he said, "because this one has led the way. This will be one of the most useful and influential buldings on the American continent. It will surpass the influence of the pyramids or of the Parthenon in the world's history. It will be a great power house from which currents of spiritual influence will go forth to transform lives and hearts in the uttermost parts of the earth."

Preceding the actual placing of the corner stone, morning and afternoon sessions were held in the Downey Ave. Church, near the school. After a brief and interesting sketch of the beginning of the training school enterprise by Mrs. Frank Wells, W. R. Warren gave the principal address of the morning, taking as his theme: "She Hath Done What She Could." Mr. Warren held that the measure of service was not quantity but the limit of each individual's capacity. He paid glowing tribute to the men and women whose lives have made this school possible.

"This building bears one name," he said, "but lifts a manifold memorial, as it renders a manifold service. Through it a loving daughter testifies of her sainted mother to all generations. 'She Hath Done What She Could' But all motherhood is honored in the memorial to Sarah Davis Detering.

"This instantly saddens our rejoicing hearts, for Helen B. Moses, who, most completely of all we have known, gave both her living and her life to her King, will not need the room that loving hearts were preparing for her. No tablets or inscriptions are needed to make this truly and perpetually a memorial, not only to her, but to other builders of this fair structure.

"This training school will furnish young missionaries more than extra technical fitness for this work abroad. Its students will have courses of lectures and invaluable conferences from time to time with missionaries on furlough. Not the least advantages of the training school will be its close affiliation to Butler College. It will not be necessary to duplicate instruction in any subject, but all the classes of Butler will be open to the missionary students. The standards and traditions built up by many years and many mountaintop lives in the college, will become at once a part of the school's inheritance."

President T. C. Howe then extended the greetings of Butler College and of the citizens of Irvington to the C. W. B. M. He complimented them on their work and the site they had chosen and paid high tribute to Mrs. Moses, Mrs. Burgess, Mrs. Jamison and other presidents of the board whom he had known personally.

Brief talks were then given by Mr. and Mrs. Menzies and Miss Vanee of India, Jasper T. Moses and Miss Vera Wise of Mexico, W. D. Cunningham of Japan, and by several of the home missionary workers of the C. W. B. M. who were present. The music was in charge of Miss Una Dell Berry, who sang two solos, "Far and Near the Fields are Waving" and "Building for Eternity."

The afternoon session was opened with prayer by Mrs. Harlan. Mrs. Ida W. Harrison in outlining the future of the work pleaded for a high pitch of appeal to prospective missionary candidates, for nothing less than fellowship in the sacrifices and sufferings of Jesus Christ. She was followed by W. J. Wright, who said that it seemed most eminently fitting that this building which combined the features of a home and a school should be erected by our women, because the home is woman's peculiar sphere and she is also supreme in the training of the young. While bemoaning the fact that the parent society which he represented had been so long homeless, Mr. Wright extended his heartiest congratulations that the work of the C. W. B. M. was to have the benefit of the permanency and solidity of a real home.

President McLean's address, which has been referred to already, followed that of Secretary Wright. The audience was deeply impressed at the high spiritual ideals held forth by Mrs. Harrison and Mr. Wright and was profoundly silent when President McLean arose. He suggested that it was time for some enthusiasm and applause, which was liberally accorded. After singing the doxology the audience was dismissed with prayer by Dr. A. R. Benton and went directly to the training school site.

After the song, "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," Mrs. Harlan read a long list of the articles deposited in the sealed copper box that was to go in the corner stone. These include a Bible, an American flag, copies of the first and last issues of the Missionary Tidings, a copy of each of the books issued by the C. W. B. M., the declaration and address, photographs of past and present national officers of the board, a signed photograph of A. McLean and Secretary Wright's autograph, besides many other documents representing the work of the society and photographs of the most generous donors to the building fund.

The box was then lowered to its final position within the stone by Mrs. Maude D. Ferris, prayer offered by Rev. Allen B. Philputt, and the service closed with the singing of the doxology.

The building, which is now in process of construction, is built of colonial brick and Bedford stone and will be 165x95 feet and four stories in height, containing about 75 rooms. Mrs. Effie Cunningham and Mrs. Frank Wells, of this city, the centennial committee for Indiana, have visited all the training schools of the country and are embodying in this new building the ideas gained in this tour.

There will be a well-equipped gymnasium, kindergarten rooms, domestic science and music rooms on the ground floor. On the main floor will be a museum containing curios from the different missionary fields; also the offices of the national board, missionary library and rooms for the meetings of the executive board. Class rooms and dormitories for the women will occupy the third floor, while the dormitories for the men will be on the fourth floor. Here also will be a large dining-room at one end and a thoroughly modern kitchen, with a cold storage room, etc.

The school is located between Downey, University and Ohmer avenues, and in close proximity to Butler College. The college library is the only building on the plot of ground above described and as it is under the administration of the city it will be open to the students of the training school.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF OUR ENGLISH CHURCHES.

The twenty-eighth annual conference of our churches in England was held last week at Lancaster, with our extreme northern church. It was certainly one of the best we have had. We have never been more cordially received by the ministers and churches of a town than we were at Lancaster. The most significant note of the entire series of meetings was that of Christian Union. The subject was referred to over-and-over again, although only one brief address was down on the program bearing on the theme. Our feeble folk in this country have an influence in this direction far beyond what our numbers would warrant, and some of us feel that this is the field in which our work should be largely devoted in the future. The field is such that the propagation of our principles need not depend exclusively upon the multiplication of our churches as such.

We have suffered a slight loss in membership during the year in common with almost every other religious body in the country. The reports from the various churches show a hopeful spirit, however, and several forward steps are sure to be taken during the coming year both in local centers and in the general work.

The presence of several American brethren was appreciated, including Prof. B. C. Deweese and Hamilton and Gormond, evangelists.

The conference sermon was delivered by Dr. David Brook of Southport, president of the National Free Church Council. The power of his message, which was on "The Print of the Nails," was in its simplicity. It went straight to the heart. Dr. Brook was entertained at luncheon, together with the ministers of the town, by our ministers in attendance at the conference, and a delightful fellowship was enjoyed. Our preachers conducted fourteen or fifteen services in the town on the Sunday preceding the conference, including a large open-air meeting in the evening, under the auspices of the Free Church Council.

The president for the year has been Bro. Eli Brearley and he closed his year of office by delivering an excellent address on "The Present Position and Its Problem." The president-elect is Bro. Frank Coop of Southport. This is the first time that any other than a preacher has occupied the position. Bro. Coop will make the centennial year a significant one, although it was with great reluctance that he accepted the post.

"Does your school boast of a football team ?" "No; we used to boast of one, but we have to apologize for it now."

"Spelling may be a gift," groaned Mr. Tyte-Phist, whose boys were in school; "but it costs a heap to buy the spelling books!"—Chicago Tribune.

An old librarian, unable to find his umbrella one evening when it was time to close, returned, and looked anxiously for it in the card catalogue, under the letter U.

SKIN CLEARED

By Simple Change in Food.

It has been said by a physician that most diseases are the result of indigestion.

There's undoubtedly much truth in the statement, even to the cause of many unsightly eruptions, which many suppose can be removed by applying some remedy on the outside.

By changing her food a Kan. girl was relieved of an eczema which was a great annoyance to her. She writes:

"For five months I was suffering with an eruption on my face and hands which our doctor called eczema and which caused me a great deal of inconvenience. The suffering was almost unbearable.

"The medicine I took only gave me temporary relief. One day I happened to read somewhere that eczema was caused by indigestion. Then I read that many persons had been relieved of indigestion by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I decided to try it. I liked the taste of the food and was particularly pleased to notice that my digestion was improving and that the eruption was disappearing as if by magic. I had at last found, in this great food, something that reached my trouble.

"When I find a victim of this affliction I remember my own former suffering and advise a trial of Grape-Nuts food instead of medicines." "There's a Reason."

There were two accessions last week at the Sheffield Ave. Church, Chicago, of which W. F. Shaw is pastor.

John L. Brandt will hold a meeting this month for the church in Moweaqua, Ill. D. G. Dungan is minister.

C. J. Robinson has been called for another year at Heyworth, Ill. He has been made happy by a fine increase in salary.

C. B. Newman, formerly pastor in Indianapolis, Ind., and other cities, is reported seriously ill at his home in Oregon.

Under the leadership of George E. Prewitt, the church in Aurora, Mo., is building a modern and commodious church house.

E. B. Kemm and his people recently dedicated an addition to the Sunday school rooms of the church at Gibson City, Ill.

Guy L. Zerby will be a student in Eureka College next month and desires to preach for a church near Eureka. He has a good record in Illinois.

W. S. Johnson will begin a meeting at Lewis, Iowa. Sherman McClure is the minister there and we expect a good meeting as a result of their efforts.

Richard W. Gentry, associate pastor of the Memorial Church, Chicago, is smilingly receiving the congratulations of friends because of the arrival of Richard Gentry, Jr.

There are frequent additions to the church in Enid, Okla., of which Randolph Cook is pastor. He is publishing one of the best local papers which comes to our exchange desk.

At Belding, Mich., where O. W. Winter is pastor of our church, union services are held Sunday evenings. Four Protestant churches unite in these meetings with much of interest and profit.

Twenty-one persons have united with the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., in recent weeks. The pastor, B. S. Ferrall, and his family, will spend all of August near Angola, Ind., at Lake James.

A. C. Gray has resigned as pastor in Ann Arbor, Mich., and will teach in Eureka College as one of the professors in the Bible department. He will add much to the strength of that department.

John Lord, of Vigan, P. I., reports two schools recently opened among the head-hunter tribes of the interior. These neglected people are greatly enthused over their opportunity to learn. Bro. Lord also reports two native chapels recently dedicated.

Fred E. Hagin and family, missionaries of the Foreign Society, will sail on the Manchuria from San Francisco, Aug. 15. They have been home on furlough and go back to Tokyo, Japan, to resume their missionary work. Their stay in America has been an inspiration to the work. Bro. Hagin stirred the churches greatly with his strong addresses during the rallies last winter.

Prof. C. T. Paul, of Hiram, Ohio, is to conduct a mission study class during the convention at New Orleans. This class will be held from 8:30 to 9:30 each morning, just before the regular program begins. This will be a great class and every delegate ought to be in it. Prof. Paul is one of the most successful mission study teachers in the world. He will use a book on Home, and one on Foreign Missions.

William Remfry Hunt sails from England to China early in September, and his family also return after furlough. They have spent their vacation largely in England where their relatives reside. They were in America a few weeks. The Seventh St. Church of Richmond, Va., supports Bro. Hunt. This church was greatly stirred by his recent visit to them. Bro. Hunt's new book "Heathenism Under the Searchlight," has evoked wide and favorable comment in England.

Bro. George W. Muckley, secretary of the Church Extension Fund, is staying at Rochester, Minn., for a few weeks, with Mrs. Muckley, who passed through a very severe operation in the hospital at that place last week. At last report her condition was favorable, but some time must pass before the results are fully known. Meantime the Disciples everywhere will be deeply concerned in the anxious and trying experience of one of our beloved and faithful leaders.

SOUTH KENTUCKY.

Under the caption the evangelist of the south field reserves the right to write about anything that may be of interest to the cause of Jesus Christ.

(1) It is not too late for me to say, that we had under very discouraging circumstances one of the most enthusiastic conventions at Princeton, May 25-27, we ever have had. There was a decided gain in the financial receipts over any previous year since the present evangelist has been in the work. More evangelistic meetings were held the past missionary year than ever before.

One of the special features of the meeting that added great interest was the inspiring presence and talks of such men as J. B. Briney, W. T. Moore and Carey E. Morgan. We shall ever remember with pleasure and profit their coming. But from present indications our South Kentucky Christian Missionary and Sunday School Association is no more. For about thirty-four years this association has been doing work in the extreme part of western Kentucky. For some years past many who have taken the most vital interest in the work have thought that a union of the entire missionary forces of the state would better the condition and further the interests of the cause of Kentucky missions. At Princeton the South Kentucky convention voted unanimously, with the exception of one man, to unite our missionary forces. So we expect to have the first united convention at Hopkinsville, September 21-24, and any person who fails to attend will miss, I predict, one of the most enthusiastic conventions ever held in Kentucky. Get ready to attend. A one fare plus twenty-five cents for the round trip has been secured over all the railroads. Lodging and breakfast will be provided for all who will send their names to Harry D. Smith, Hopkinsville, Ky.

Be sure to attend to this at once, that homes may be provided for all.

(2) The next thing that I want to say is that the evangelist has been constantly in the field since the South Kentucky convention was held in May at Princeton. Three meetings have been held, one at Eucrgesia, a country church in Christian county. Beginning July 1, at Lyonville, Graves county, and continuing for nineteen days, forty-eight souls were baptized and five others united with the church, making fifty-three in all. Some touching scenes of this meeting I would like to relate, but space forbids. The next meeting was held at Cuba, just four miles away, taking up exactly the remainder of the month, resulting in sixteen additions. I am now in the extreme southwestern corner of the state holding a meeting at Mt. Herman church. R. P. Meeks preaches for this little band. I could not gain the consent of my mind to disclose to the reading public the sad condition of this church, caused by some extreme views adopted and executed by some of the old church, resulting in the withdrawing of the best people I ever knew. Let us draw a veil over the scene.

(3) What I want now to say is:—The time draweth nigh, even at our doors, when all of the churches of Christ are called on to take the offering for Church Extension. Will any one—can any church afford to refuse this call? I hope and pray not. Sept. 6 the first Sunday in the month is the time. Any Sunday in the month will do. Take the offering and send it, much or little, to G. W. Muckley, 600 Waterworks Building, Kansas City, Mo. Don't fail.

(4) Now I want to say one more thing, viz.—Oct. 9-15, 1908, is the date when another great event is to take place. Our International Conventions are to be held at New Orleans, Louisiana. There are so many good reasons why we should make every effort to attend. I cannot undertake to mention them. Every necessary preparation is being made. The whole state of Louisiana and the historic city of New Orleans have thrown wide open their doors and said, "Come in and make yourselves at home." Could we ask for more than has been offered us? Will we refuse to go and give every encouragement to the little band of Disciples in New Orleans trying to establish the cause of primitive Christianity in that great city? Let's all go up and possess the land.

All aboard for New Orleans, Oct. 9-15, 1908.

W. J. HUDSPETH.

Hopkinsville, Ky., Aug. 10, 1908.

KANSAS, WYOMING AND MONTANA.

Found the work at my home town in very good condition.

Bro. Ellis Purlee will remain with the Coffeyville Church and plans are being laid for a big revival and a larger work.

Aug. 1 and 2 visited Sheridan, Wyo. It is a beautiful city of about 10,000. Our church people, under the splendid leadership of Bro. O. A. Adams, are surprising the whole community. One hundred and seven have been added to the church since Jan. 1, 1908. About $900 has been put in improvements inside the building. They have a membership of over 200 and a Sunday school of nearly 300. Bro. Caywood, a young real estate man, is superintendent and certainly means business. The Senior C. E. has a large enrolment and the Junior will be organized this fall.

Sunday morning I gave an address in the interest of our C. W. B. M. work. At the close of the address and in response to an invitation to become members of the auxiliary nineteen women came forward and six people to unite with the church

In the afternoon at four o'clock we met to perfect the auxiliary organization and two more women and four men gave their names, making in all twenty-five charter members. The following officers were elected:

President—Mrs. Frank Huber.

Vice President—Mrs. Belle Goodnight.

Treasurer—Mrs. O. A. Adams.

Secretary—Mrs. W. H. Taylor.

The church is planning for a great revival in October, when Bros. Allan Wilson and Miller will be with them.

From Sheridan I left for my work at Joliet, Mont., spending one day in Billings, arriving in time to help about thirty of our church people give Bro. Jordan and his wife a "pounding."

The prospects for a splendid meeting at Joliet are good.

Bro. O. G. Shanklin and his wife have thoroughly prepared for the revival, having visited every home and given personal invitations to these services. Bro. Shanklin has been here eight years. Every Lord's day he preaches three sermons, riding twenty-five miles, and attends two Sunday schools. We need more such workers in Montana.

We expect to make a splendid report of the revival work later.

EUREKA COLLEGE.

Six of the teachers of Eureka College are spending the summer at different universities. Profs. Jones, Cannon, Compton and wife, are at the University of Wisconsin; Miss Baxter is taking advance work in the University of Indiana; and Prof. Gray is finishing his work in the University of Michigan.

The Eureka Chautauqua held its second session recently and the program was extraordinary. It looks as if this would become a permanent feature of our interests in this part of the state. The chautauqua is held on the campus of Eureka College and is helping us very materially to get our educational interests before this part of the state.

The Boosters' Club of Eureka College brings glad tidings to the college authorities through the word of Mr. William Price, a member of the graduating class of next year and president of the club. Word has been received from quite a number of the old students that they will return next year with from one to three students each.

For the first time in the history of Eureka College the class of 1908 issued an annual. It is called "The Tub." This volume is full of valuable information and beautiful pictures of college buildings and interests. It has already done the college a great amount of good and is destined to do still more good. The proceeds from the sale of the annual will go to the college for the re-seating of the chapel, which has been recently frescoed and otherwise improved.

The campaign committee of Eureka College recently met in the office of Mr. A. J. Elliott in Peoria to receive the report of the field secretary, H. H. Peters, and to plan work for the remainder of the summer and early fall. The work that has been accomplished during the past six months has been successful and the outlook never was brighter. The Committee is made up of men of vision and every movement is entered into with care.

Knox P. Taylor of Bloomington, Ill., spent a few days last week in Eureka. In a public service held in the Christian Church, Bro. Taylor spoke of the great good that Eureka College and the Christian church in Eureka had done for our cause in Illinois, and throughout the world.

OF INTEREST TO MEXICO VISITORS.

To Editor CHRISTIAN CENTURY, Chicago, Ill.:

Dear Sir:—While I am away down in Mexico, I do not want my friends who read the CHRISTIAN CENTURY to think that I am out of the world, or have no business opportunities, for I am making more money now than I ever did in my life.

Four years ago I took up a fruit claim. They give you the land if you will pay for setting out five acres of tropical fruit trees, within five years. The Department of Improvement set out my banana trees, 1,500 on the five acres, and attended to them for two years, or until the first crop was ready to gather, and it cost me $620. The Department of Improvement will care for your trees, and gather and market your fruit continuously, for one-third of the crop, and so I just let them attend to my orchard.

In 1907 the department paid me for my share, $1,281.30 in gold. For the first six months of 1908 I have received $708.76 in gold, and expect the last half of the year will bring me a little more. You get your money every three months, as bananas are picked and marketed every day of the year. I think this is doing pretty well for a woman in a strange land?

You do not have to come to Mexico to take up land; just write to the official in charge, Senor Elisha D. Ely, Tuxteoec, Mexico, for blanks to take up fruit claims, and he will send you full particulars. You can pay for setting out the trees in installments of $5 a month if you wish, and you need never go to Mexico, if you prefer living elsewhere.

MRS. MARY BENNETT.

"Who is the fellow with the long hair?" "He's a Yale college boy." "Well, I've often heard of those Yale loeks."

"Mother," said a thoughtful Boston child, "is Philadelphia older than Boston?" "Of course not, my son. The first settlement was made in Charlestown in 1630, while William Penn did not arrive on the site of Philadelphia until fifty-two years later." "That was always my impression, mother; how is it then that Philadelphia is mentioned in the Bible, while Boston is not?"

"What can be more perfeet in its way," says the Buffalo Commercial, "than the remark of Tommy (hampered with a conscience and home from an afternoon party): 'Mamma, darling, I've a great favor to ask of you. Please don't ask me how I behaved.'"

The late Professor Jowett had a curious way of commenting on the work that was brought to him by students. On one occasian he was shown a set of Greek verses. After looking them over carefully, he glanced up rather blankly, and said to the author, "Have you any taste for mathematics?"—Argonaut.

In a little village in New Jersey the school mistress saw one of the little boys crying. She called him to her and inquired the reason. "Some of the big boys made me kiss a little girl out in the school-yard," was the reply. "Why, that is outrageous! Why did you not come right to me?" "I—I didn't know that you would let me kiss you," he said.—Chicago Daily News.

SELF DELUSION

Many People Deceived by Coffee.

We like to defend our indulgences and habits even though we may be convinced their actual harmfulness.

A man can convince himself that whisky is good for him on a cold morning, or beer on a hot summer day—when he wants the whisky or beer?

It's the same with coffee. Thousands of people suffer headaehe and nervousness year after year but try to persuade themselves the cause is not coffee—because they like coffee.

"While yet a child I commenced using coffee and continued it," writes a Wis. man, "until I was a regular coffee fiend. I drank it every morning and in consequence had a blinding headache nearly every afternoon.

"My folks thought it was coffee that ailed me, but I liked it and would not admit it was the cause of my trouble, so I stuck to coffee and the headaches stuck to me.

"Finally, the folks stopped buying coffee and brought home some Postum. They made it right (directions on pkg.) and told me to see what difference it would make with my head, and during that first week on Postum my old affliction did not bother me once. From that day to this we have used nothing but Postum in place of coffee—headaches are a thing of the past and the whole family is in fine health."

"Postum looks good, smells good, tastes good, is good, and does good to the whole body." "There's a Reason."

CHURCH ADDITIONS.

Salt Lake City, Utah.—There were twelve additions, three baptisms, last month at regular services.—Dr. Albert Buxton, pastor.

Belding, Mich.—At regular services Sunday morning, August 9, two excellent young women made the confession, and one week ago an older lady also came forward. There is good interest in every department.— O. W. Winter.

Conyers, Ga.—Our meeting at Bethel Church, Rockdale County, closed August 5 with two additions, one by confession and baptism, and one by statement. E. Everett Hollingworth, Minister.

A SPENDTHRIFT.

Publican—"And how do you like being married, John?"

John—"Don't like it at all."

Publican—"Why, what's the matter wi' she, John?"

John—"Well, first thing in the morning it's money; when I goes 'ome to my dinner it's money again, and at supper it's the same. Nothing but money, money, money!"

Publican—"Well, I never! What do she do wi' all that money?"

John—"I dunno. I ain't given her any yet."—Punch.

An Absent-Minded Professor.

"Dr. J— is a scientist, and therefore a deep thinker, and, consequently, often preoccupied and absent-minded. His most recent adventure attributable to his absent-minded propensities is at present furnishing much amusement for the faculty.

"He was reading one evening after dinner when his wife approached and, touching him on the shoulder, remarked softly: 'Oliver, Mr. and Mrs. B— are coming over this evening, so just go upstairs and change your coat.'

"The quiet little professor complied without a murmur. An hour later, when the visitors had been in the house some time, the hostess excused herself for a moment and slipped upstairs to see what detained the doctor. She found him in bed, calmly sleeping.

"'Oh, to be sure, the B—s,' he said, when she awakened him. 'I'll be right down. I guess I was a little absent-minded. I must have forgotten what I came for when I removed my coat, for I kept on undressing and went to bed'."

At the beginning of the recent Russo-Japanese War a schoolmaster told a class of boys the cause of the fighting, and then asked all who favored the war to hold up their hands. Up went every hand but one. "Well, Jack, why are you opposed to the war?" asked the master. "'Cause, sir, war makes history, an' there's more now'n I can ever learn," was the totally unexpected answer of the youngster.

Father—"You are very backward in your arithmetic. When I was your age I was doing cube root." Boy—"What's that?" Father—"What! You don't even know what it is? Dear me, that's terrible. Here, give me your pencil. Now we'll take say, 1, 2, 3, 4 and find the cube root. First you divide—no; you—let me see—um—yes—no—well, never mind—after all, perhaps you're too young to understand it."

An English health officer recently received the following note from one of the residents of his district, "Dear Sir,—I beg to tell you that my child, aged eight months, is suffering from an attack of measles, as required by act of parliament."

"Mr. Gibbons," said the teacher of the class in rhetoric, "point out the absurdity in this figure of speech: 'At this time the Emperor Frederick hatched out a scheme,' etc." "It seems to me all right," replied the young man after some reflection. "It does? Explain if you please, how he could have 'hatched out' a scheme." "Well, he might have had his mind set on it."

September Offering for Church Extension

Begins Sunday, September 6th. Continuing every Sunday in September.

Homeless churches are stars of the sixth magnitude (scarcely seen with the naked eye) or of the thirteenth magnitude (scarcely seen with the telescope) and their light goes out forever.

We began Church Extension in 1888 with $10,662. The Board asked for $250,000 by 1900 and $500,000 by 1905. We passed our marks in both cases. Shall the doubtful mark remain after the Centennial? Our brethren must answer.

CHURCHES SHOULD

Try to take the Offering on the day appointed, if that day is favorable, and send increased offerings.

However, all Sundays in September are for Church Extension offerings, so do not sacrifice the Offering for the day.

Fourteen Hundred and Sixteen congregations contributed to Church Extension last year. The Board realizes that September is an unfortunate month for Offerings in many churches, but more of our churches should and do their best. City congregations should wait until their people have returned from vacations. This is the Lord's work and every church wearing his name should be in line.

Take the Offering

Order supplies from, and send offerings promptly to

G. W. MUCKLEY, 500 Waterworks Bldg.,
Kansas City, Mo.

GOOD POINTS FOR YOU TO CONSIDER WHEN GIVING TO CHURCH EXTENSION

CENTENNIAL WATCHWORD—"We must raise $150,000 this year and $200,000 next year to reach the million."

1. Money repeats itself in this Fund every five years.
2. Churches are helped that first help themselves.
3. The work pays for itself by the four per cent interest which is charged.
4. This is a permanent Fund to loan to churches that can not borrow elsewhere or except at exorbitant rates of interest.
5. The church aided first helps itself. When our loan is sent it pays the last dollar of indebtedness.
6. Every dollar loaned calls out three others. The church aided raises three dollars for every one loaned.
7. The Board has handled all the money contributed to the Fund plus over $780,000, which has been paid back on loans, making a total of more than $1,440,000, which has been loaned to 1,178 mission churches scattered through 44 States and Territories and only $563 has been lost, where congregations voluntarily deeded their property to the Board for debts against them.

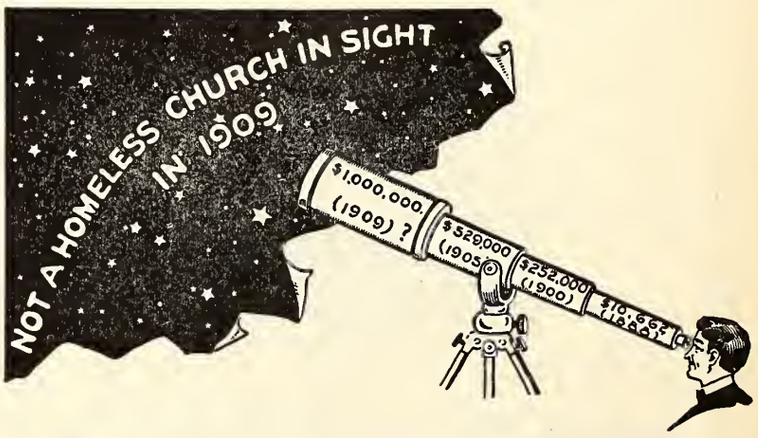
EXPLANATION OF NAMED FUNDS.

We now have 29 Named Funds. We want 50 by 1909. A Named Fund in our Church Extension work is $5,000 or as much more as the donor desires to make it, and is named after the donor or any one he may designate. Individuals give $500 annually to create them and churches $300 annually. A separate account is kept of each Named Fund and a spearate annual report made to the donor. All loans are made from this Fund to help build churches and are paid back into the Fund in five equal annual installments. The interest at four per cent is kept in the Fund and compounds itself semi-annually. As soon as enough money is accumulated from new gifts, interest, and returns from loans, another loan is made. The money is constantly repeating its work by coming back and going out again in loans to help weak and struggling churches complete their first church building. Money more than doubles its work every five years. For example, $2,500 will do the work of $6,221 in five years, building 12 churches with loans of $500 each.

Thus, the F. M. Drake Loan Fund has built 66 churches since February, 1889, and has done the work of over $26,000 and earned $3,672 of interest, though Brother Drake gave only $1,200 in 1889 and $380 each year until he paid in $5,000 within 10 years.

READ THIS FOR CONSCIENCE' SAKE

SINCE our April meeting your Board of Church Extension has been compelled, because of lack of money, to refuse aid to all applicants except in a few cases where small loans were granted out of our Named Funds. We have had seventy-eight applications for help since April, and every appealing congregation came with strong pleadings showing the best of reasons why we should help them to build. Each congregation was in a growing town or city with great promise of a strong church if only an adequate building could be erected. None of these can be aided until we hear from our Annual Offering in September. Our Offering must bring over Eighty Thousand Dollars if these worthy mission churches are to be aided.



The Church that is Properly Housed becomes a Fixed Star of the First Magnitude—a Shining Light within its Own Community, to its Own Country and Throughout the Whole World.

THE ANNUITY PLAN. WHAT IT IS! HOW IT WORKS!

IN OUR CHURCH EXTENSION FUND, AT KANSAS CITY, MO.

What It Is—Through our Annuity Plan you can administer upon your own estate by putting your money into our Church Extension Fund. This is far better than making a bequest, because the Board will pay you 6 per cent, in semi-annual payments, if you are fifty years old, or more, and the interest will be paid to your wife if she survives you. Between the ages of forty and forty-nine the rate is 5 per cent, and 4 per cent, between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine.

IT'S GREAT ADVANTAGES TO YOU:

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no rouble or losses in making reinvestments.
3. You have no taxes or attorneys' fees to pay and your income is regular.
4. The Society is perpetual and is incorporated. Its funds are perpetual and are loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. Your money is safe because the Annuity Bond which the Board issues you is as good as a Government Bond because it is backed up by all of the assets of the Fund, which now amount to $650,000 and which will constantly increase.
6. We receive remittances of $100, or as many hundreds or thousands as you can send, and your money will be received at any time and the Bond will be dated so that your interest begins at once.

How Your Money Works—The Board does not invest your money in some secular enterprise and WAIT FOR YOU TO DIE before using it in the work of Church Extension. All of our Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to aid promising congregations to build. The moey is returned by the churches using it in five equal, annual installments, and as fast as it returns it goes out again and again to build churches. Your money is thus in a PERPETUAL WHIRL OF DOING GOOD, because we have more demands for Annuity money than we can answer. Our mission churches in the new Southwest are glad to get Annuity money from the Board of Church Extension and pay 6 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more than is charged for the regular funds. They then have their loans in the hands of their friends.

Our Annuity Fund has received 224 gifts and $215,000, and 125 church buildings have been erected by Annuity Funds alone.

We can use $100,000 this year. Send remittances at once and give your full legal name and your age. Remit to

THE MYSTIC SEA.

BY PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR.

The smell of the sea in my nostrils,
The sound of the sea in mine ears;
The touch of the spray on my burning face,
Like the mist of reluctant tears;

The blue of the sky above me,
The green of the waves beneath;
The sun flashing down on a gray-white sail
Like a scimiter from its sheath.

And ever the breaking billows,
And ever the rocks' disdain,
And ever a thrill in mine inmost heart
That my reason cannot explain.

So I said to my heart, "Be silent;
The mystery of time is here;
Death's way will be plain when we fathom the main
And the secret of life be clear."

Altar Stairs

By JUDGE, CHARLES J. SCOFIELD, Author of A Subtle Adversary. Square 12mo., cloth. Beautifully designed cover, back and side title stamped in gold. Illustrated, $1.20.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

The story will not only entertain all readers, but will also impart many valuable moral lessons. This is an age of story reading and the attention of the young especially, should be called to such books of fiction as "Altar Stairs."

W. G. WALTERS, Bluefield, W. Va.

If one begins this story, he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished.

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith

By HERBERT L. WILLETT, Author of The Ruling Quality, etc. Post 8vo. cloth. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top. Illustrated, 75 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. Its fascination holds the reader's attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished. Read what the reviewers say.

More of such books are needed just now among those who are pleading the restoration of Apostolic Christianity.

JAMES C. CREEL,
Plattsburg, Mo.

It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of the truer life, possible only to him who has tarried praverfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher.

J. E. CHASE.

It is a good book and every Christian ought to read it.

L. V. BARBREE,

EDITORIAL

Announcement.

Our readers are probably aware that the past few weeks have been a time of financial stress and difficulty for the Christian Century. For reasons which it is to no purpose to discuss the Company has been burdened with debt beyond its ability to bear. A crisis has been approaching for many months. This crisis, painful and regrettable in every aspect, we are able to announce is now past. A new company is in process of formation. The old editorial staff will continue with the new paper together with important additions. Ample capital and a proper business policy will henceforth stand under the ideals this paper has striven to promote. All friends of these ideals will rejoice that the paper which has represented them so ably hitherto will in the future be able to lead on more confidently than ever.

As soon as the details of the new arrangement are fully completed our readers will be taken frankly into the confidence of the management.

Chicago and the Convention.

The presence of the Illinois convention in Chicago this week is an event of unusual meaning. The problem of entertaining a state convention on the basis of free hospitality to its delegates is one that only a strong congregation dares undertake. For this reason Chicago has never had the pleasure of entertaining the brethren of the state in their annual conference. The time has come, however, when our strength in the city warrants our attempt to return to the brethren of the state the courtesies they have so often offered us. Chicago Disciples do not, as a rule, live in large, roomy houses as do our brethren in the smaller towns, but our welcome to our flats is as whole-souled as did we offer the capacious houses of the Lake Shore Drive.

The convention means much to us. The proneness of Chicago and the rest of the state to think themselves apart from each other in political matters is in danger of reflecting itself in our church life. It is important for Chicago Disciples to possess a state consciousness as well as a city consciousnes. It is likewise important for the state to remember that Chicago is a part of Illinois and that, for good or ill, its future cannot but affect the character of the larger commonwealth. Our interests are identical. Our problems are identical. Our faith is identical. It is therefore wholesome for us to come together often for mutual inspiration and counsel.

Besides the preparation of our homes for entertainment, the committees have been assiduous in two matters: arranging for the convention to use the Y. M. C. A. auditorium in the heart of the city for its sessions, and to give a splendid banquet for the men of the state at the Auditorium Hotel on Tuesday evening. We shall not suggest the difficulties under which the committees have worked, principal among which is the fact that so many Chicago people have been absent from town on their summer vacations and have not yet, many of them, returned. No doubt the faithful workers will have all things ready quite as well as if they had been backed by all their customary helpers.

The most interesting features of any convention of Christian people are the fellowships it occasions among brethren. Whatever the merits of the program, it is rarely the prearranged features of a program that are carried with us the longest. The impromptu, unexpected, personal expressions often make upon our memory the deepest mark.

The Christian Century joins with the churches of Disciples in Chicago in a cordial welcome of the convention and in the prayer that this gathering may deepen the fellowship, broaden the vision and intensify the zeal of all Disciples in our state.

Miracle and Faith.

The objection which has most weight in our day, and which unless removed will stand as a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of the miracles, is the apparent chasm which separates these phenomena from the uniform course of events in human experience and under the reign of law. It is no answer to assert that a divine being is above law, for that begs the question at the start, and overlooks the fact that the laws of nature are simply God's ways of working and thus are the disclosure of his own character. The suspension of these laws would not only work havoc in the order of nature but would be a contradiction of the conception of God which not only the unvarying and majestic order of the universe but the teachings of the Scriptures have made impressive. If the prophets permitted themselves to use language which implied the vibrant and changeful character of God, even his arbitrary and autocratic reversals of mood, they have left us abundant proof that these are but the forms and figures of speech with which they sought to explain the mystery of the divine, and that behind them all there lies the deeper and more impressive conception of a natural and moral order which is certain and satisfying because it knows no change.

It may be that the proper definition of miracle will assist in the quest for a tenable position, conservative of the facts both of science and the Bible. It is often the case that controversies thrive on the failure to make clear the points of belief. There are two views which for the sake of the discussion may be set in contrast. One asserts that miracle is the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law. According to this theory there are two realms of life, the natural and the supernatural. The laws, the life, the character of the one are distinct from those of the other. The order of life native to the higher realm is superior to and independent of the laws of the lower realm. A being belonging to the supernatural realm may therefore employ the forces of nature in whatever manner he elects. Its laws may be reversed, its direction changed, its processes interrupted or accelerated at will. These violations of law, nature is powerless to resist. They emanate from the being of the superior realm before whom natural law is silent and submissive, ready for temporary or indefinite suspension. Such a being was Jesus. He was a visitant to the world, but his normal residence was in heaven, whose supernatural character he bore in his earthly life, and with whose powers he was clothed. His miracles were the manifestations of this superior life, the setting aside of nature in obedience to a higher law. This theory encounters no difficulty in the mind of one who accepts the earlier view of the world. But it is in direct conflict with all modern conceptions, and is either giving way to more satisfactory explanations of the facts or to the total rejection of the miraculous. And indeed if this view is all that stands between unreflective belief and blank denial, the case looks unpromising for miracle.

The other definition asserts that miracle is the unusual but normal activity of a perfect life in the domain of nature. There is no such cleavage or dualism in the universe as that which requires the assumption of two realms, the natural and the supernatural. Indeed this distinction is unknown to the Bible, and is the creation of metaphysical speculation. All life in one. The universe is the scene of the divine activity, and its laws are merely God's ways of working. All law is natural, and at the same time it is divine. The truth that Butler saw and that Drummond interpreted more fully needs acceptance as applicable to all the ranges of life. The "Analogy" and "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" do not apply alone to the corners and fringes of things but suggest the essential oneness of the world. The Father's house is not divided against itself. The word "supernatural" is not so much untrue as insufficient. From one point of view there is no supernatural, for all things are natural and orderly. But viewed from another angle, all human life, as well as divine, is supernatural, for its true estate is superior to the visible order of the world. We belong to the higher realm; our citizenship is in heaven.

The life of Christ is the one perfect life of history. He lived the nomal, natural life of a man at its highest point. This consisted perfectly with his claim to be the Son of God. In this estate he employed law at its highest level. The responses which our inadequate and fragmentary life obtains from nature, and which become more complex and varied as we gain new altitudes of vision and new depths of spiritual experience, seem as nothing worth beside the calm supremacy of his power. He touched the keys of life beyond the range of our limited experience, and the harmony which poured forth we call miracle. His word was with power because the secret of nature was his own. Nor is there a hint in the Scripture that the works of Jesus were suspensions or suppressions of natural law. They exhibit the use of law at a higher point than that to which other lives have attained. Science may well decline to recognize the miracles of Jesus as falling within the limits of ordinary and explicable phenomena, but he would be a bold and over-confident defender of the closed circle of present knowledge who with the vast and humbling mass of fresh scientific facts daily emerging to view should assert that the miracles of Jesus are beyond the range of law, or may not ultimately be capable of scientific demonstration. Such at least is the feeling of not a few men of our day whose attainments in the arena of research entitle them to respectful hearing.

The last word has not been spoken.

In the nature of the case it never can be spoken. Meantime we may content ourselves with some approaches to a true and satisfactory view of the question. These may be set down in the following terms: The Gospel miracles leave upon the mind the impression of events which rest upon foundations of fact. None of the attempts to eliminate them from the record seem satisfactory. The view that miracle is a violation of law is fatal to the acceptance of the event. Miracle must be explained as the result of the use of natural forces at their highest level. Jesus performed miracles as having a certain value, but he regarded them as far less convincing than the appeal to intellect and conscience. In the early church they were given similar secondary significance. At the present time the miracles of the New Testament have no evidential value, because it is easier to convince men of the lordship and saviorship of Jesus than of the reality of the miracles. The latter are accepted because they are the natural activities of such a life as his, and not as the attestations of that life. The claims of miracle-working in the Old Testament rest upon less convincing evidence than those in the life of Christ. The claim that miracles have a place in ecclesiastical history and in the practice of certain religious bodies today may be in large part dismissed as lacking in credibility, and for the rest as reposing upon facts easily explicable in accordance with the laws of suggestion. The redemptive facts of Jesus' life are independent of miracle. His wonderful deeds were an aid to his followers in the creation and nourishment of their faith in him and in their immediate work of evangelization. Such a value the miracles no longer possess. But they assist in the comprehension of the origins of our faith, and of the unique influence of the Lord upon that age. Miracle had its value, but also its limitations. The greatest miracle is the life of Christ. Greater than any work he did was the nature he revealed. On this and his teachings the faith of the world rests. One proof alone is there higher and more convincing than this, and that is the presence and power of Christ in the soul.

Making Religion Technical.

The personal religion of Jesus was the simplest thing in the world. It could be expressed in small words, the common words of daily experience. No technical vocabulary was needed to transmit it. No recondite doctrines were requisite to the faithful practice of it. No elaborate organization was needed to act as a channel for it. The child was the embodiment and best illustration of it and a pure heart was the essential condition of a vision of God.

For centuries, however, the religion that goes with Christ's name has been inextricably connected with long words, hard doctrines and a close-knit organization. The assumption prevails that Christianity cannot be expressed in any save these hard terms of historic theology and that the grace of God is limited to the channels of conventional organization. Therefore many call themselves unbelievers or agnostics who have the root of faith in them, but who do not find themselves able to use the accepted vocabulary of religion. This is a sad fact and accounts for the separation of many genuine Christians from the church. We speak a foreign language to them; and their language is, if not foreign, at least pagan or "secular" to us. And all the time their real meanings may be identical with Christ's meaning and with our own. Nevertheless we insist that "shibboleth" shall not be pronounced "sibboleth," and the penalty for speaking it that way is not much different from that meted out to the luckless Ephraimites of old.

After all, our union among ourselves and with others must be on the basis of common meanings, not on a common vocabulary. No formula of the creeds nor of the New Testament, taken simply as a formula, is a guarantee of agreement even when it is pronounced in unison. It is a costly mistake to strive to run religious thought and life into any fixed mould of words. The world has lost immeasurably just because the words of scripture, especially Paul's words, have been crystallized into a technical norm for the expression of Christian experience. The holy Scriptures are the highest and finest formulation of Christian experience the world contains. But they are used at their highest purpose, not simply when they are learned by memory, but when they are allowed to fertilize the mind so that it can bring forth new words, new formulæ, original expressions of the capacious life within the soul.

Christian vocabulary has not yet reached its limit. The "sound words" which the authorized version makes Paul exhort Timothy to "hold fast" are correctly rendered "sound teaching" in the modern translation. Paul never dreamed that from his letters would be extracted the normative vocabulary of Christian theology. He was engaged in the enterprise of emancipating Jewish Christians from Judaism, and the technique of his thinking was conditioned by the concrete problem he was facing. He must offer Christianity to the Jew in such terms that it shall mean truth to him, that it shall satisfy the questions his Jewish heart is concerned with. Under different circumstances we find Paul using a different form of speech, a different argument, as when he faced a non-Jewish audience at Athens. Here he spoke from presuppositions quite unlike those upon which he addressed his Jewish brethren.

In John's gospel we have a unique writing among the New Testament books. Its typical concepts are not only unlike Paul's but vary obviously from the other gospels. There is a bigness in John's record, a depth of mysticism, a sweep of vision that the other gospels seem not to have. John seems to be viewing Christ's life from the standpoint of heaven, of eternity. He is therefore less technical, more universal in his concepts and vocabulary. He uses the great-big little words, such as "life," "light," "spirit," "truth," "death," "see," "know," with a unique frequency and richness. The Pauline concepts of "Justification," "Redemption," "Adamic Sin," "Adoption," "Righteousness by law versus righteousness by faith," "the covenants," and such like do not occur in his gospel. These latter were Paul's own, forged to solve a particular set of problems and to save Israel from the narrow pocket of self-righteousness into the freedom of Christ's gospel.

Christianity has been unfortunately limited and even distorted by the fact that for centuries theologians have gone to Paul's writings almost exclusively for the stuff out of which their systems have been made. The assumption has prevailed that the problem Paul faced is a perennial problem, persisting ever in the same form, and therefore solvable by the same arguments he used. But this is not so. To men of modern times religion knows no such problem as apostolic Judaism presented. To force the vocabulary of Paul's argument upon us is therefore not only to weight religion down with irrelevancies and to make it difficult and unreal but to miss the essential meaning of Paul's words. We are not for a moment suggesting that Paul's argument is not true. It was not only true but masterfully true. It is ours, however, not to copy his vocabulary merely, or his concepts, but discerning his point of vision, and catching his spirit, to turn our faces toward our own problems as he met his.

This way of looking at religion makes it a broader, more real and simpler matter than we usually assume. It is not a form of words that we are to learn, but a spirit, and attitude, a temper, with respect to our life that it is important for us to adopt. A gentleman was the other day describing to us a new acquaintance he had just made. "He is a most intelligent man and we talked until midnight," he said. "Did you talk about religion?" we asked. "No, I don't think he knows much about religion; we talked about life," was the reply. What a pity! What a pity that religion has been separated by its technical vocabulary from the realities of life so that intelligent men, responsive to the great interests of life, do not know that true life and religion are one.

This, at least, is what Jesus said he came to do for men, not to found a new religion, nor to teach a new form of words, nor to establish a more effective organization, but simply to give "life more abundantly."

Universities and Christian Union.

Professor Ernest D. Burton, of the University of Chicago, in an article in the Standard on "The Christian University and the World-Wide Mission of Christianity," urges the importance of universities in the Christianization of China. He says: "That, in particular for which the hour calls is the speedy establishment of Christian universities in China, and in other lands which it is our mission to reach and influence. I say universities, rather than colleges, not because I would have these schools bear ambitious names, repeating the mistake that has so often been made in this country, and founding a high school and calling it a university, but because it is a real university that China needs—an institution of that breadth of spirit which would make it really entitled to this name. Such universities should be Christian, not in the sense that they exist to propagate the views of any western sect of Christianity, not in the sense that they should be chiefly devoted to the study of theology, or the direct propagation of religion, but that they should be controlled by Christian ideals, characterized by that same love of truth, openness to truth and zeal for human welfare which it is the ideal and to some extent the effect of every truly Christian university in Christian lands to inculcate and foster, Christian universities in the same sense in which Princeton and Yale and Brown are such." Prof. Burton and Prof. T. C. Chamberlain, both of the University of Chicago, have been appointed as an "Oriental Investigation Commission" to spend the next year in China investigating the educational needs and opportunities of the country with a view to the establishment of universities on a large scale in all parts of the empire. The bearing which the university ideal has upon the unification of Christendom is stated in the following words: "The founding of Christian universities on the foreign mission field will tend to diminish emphasis upon denominational peculiarities, and to strengthen emphasis on the cardinal truths of Christianity—personal faith in God as revealed in Jesus Christ, personal devotion to the welfare of men for whom Christ gave his life. This is, if I am rightly informed, the inclination of the wisest and strongest men on the mission field. Out there in the face of heathenism our sectarian differences grow less important, and were it not for the pressure from the churches at home would be more minimized than they are."

"The Christian university and world-wide Christian missions! Shall there be a new alliance between the representatives of these two creations of the Spirit of Christ? Shall the need of the eastern world and the unparalleled opportunity that God has set before the western world rouse us all to eagerness and consecration such as we have never known before, melt the barriers that have separated us one from another, and unite us in heart and effort?"

It has long been known that the atmosphere of a university was a good dissolvent for sectarian bigotry and conceit, and a medium uncongenial for the culture of sectarian assertiveness. That is why some of the most sectarian denominations fear the atmosphere of a university and its influence upon the minds of ministerial students. Young men gathered together in a university from different denominations can not mingle in the libraries and class-rooms in the free pursuit of the truth, without discovering much truth in common among all sects, and the common indebtedness of each to all others for the truth they hold. The university is a specific cure for all forms of sectarianism, cocksureness and infallibility, if taken in sufficiently large doses.

I submit the following plan of action for the unification of Christendom in this generation: Let all Protestant denominations agree to train their men for the ministry in a single university where every teacher and student shall be free to investigate an dto speak the truth as he finds it. If that will not bring unity in a single generation, nothing will.

Do you believe that the Ten Plagues were merely a series of unusual natural disasters? A. K. B.

The uniform impression gained from the Old Testament narratives is that Israel left Egypt in a time of unusual disturbance caused by disasters which were unknown in the land, but whose force and numbers paralyzed the native people, and were interpreted by the Hebrews as the signs of God's providential activity in their behalf. The wonder of the Exodus consisted not in the nature or method of the plagues, but in the use made of them by Moses under divine direction for the deliverance of the nation. Professor Sayce, the foremost champion of the conservative school of archealogical study as against the critical views of the Old Ttestament says, "There was nothing in the plagues themselves that was either supernatural or contra-natural. They were signs and wonders, not because they introduced new and unknown forces into the life of the Egyptians, but because the diseases and plagues already known to the country were intensified in action and crowded into a short space of time." Early Hebrew History, p. 169). Professor Petrie, the best authority upon the monumental discoveries in Egypt, and a strong defender of the Biblical accounts, says "Seeing that the land there (in the desert) was sufficient to support his kindred, he (Moses) came back and tried to get permission for them to go on a pilgrimage to the sacred mountain. This was refused, but many troubles of bad seasons, and a plague at last so disheartened the Egyptians that, in the confusion, some thousands of these tribes escaped into the wilderness. They safely crossed the shallows of the gulf, but a detachment of troops following them was swept away." (Researches in Sinai, p. 221). These are not the words of "higher critics," but of men determined to maintain as far as possible the historicity of the Old Testament records.

Is the story of the crossing of the Red Sea merely a poetic story, and without basis of fact so far as the dividing of the waters is concerned? B.

The prose narrative in Ex. 14 is at pains to point out the driving back of the waters of the gulf by a strong east wind with ridges of sea bed exposed, and deeper channels still flooded here and there like protections (translated "walls") on either side. The poetic account in chapter 15 is far more picturesque, but less intelligible. Dean Stanley says of this event, "The passage as thus described was effected not in the calmness and clearness of daylight, but in the depth of midnight, amidst the roar of the hurricane which caused the sea to go back—amidst a darkness lit up only by the broad glare of the lightning as 'the Lord looked out' from the thick darkness of the cloud. We know not, they knew not, by what precise means the deliverance was wrought. The obscurity, the mystery, here as elsewhere, was part of the lesson." (See Petrie's words above). The fact of the crossing of the Red sea (i . e. the waters of the Gulf of Suez, either near the present place of that name, or further north at some point to which it once extended), is one of the conspicuous and undisputed facts of Hebrew history. It is this fact as the birth moment of the nation that has significance, and not the manner of its occurrence.

The anti-saloon movement has struck the Illinois Central Railroad. Officials of that road have given orders that no liquor be sold on trains south of the Ohio River. General Passenger Agent Samuel G. Hatch said recently: "Yes, we have stopped the sale of intoxicating drinks on our trains south of the Ohio. There are so many anti-saloon stations on our southern lines that we thought it best to do this. Louisiana has gone the anti-saloon people one better and passed a law forbidding passengers drinking on trains, even from their own bottles. Texas has had a similar law for some time and its effect, I understand, has been beneficial to all concerned."

CHAPTER XI.

Evelyn.

"Good morning, Mrs. Kirklin."

It was early in April, in the year 1903. The breath of spring was in the air and a robin caroled from a tree near by. Maidie was watering some geraniums that stood in the window, and as she looked up she saw Evelyn standing in the open door. It was the Evelyn of ten years ago, only more beautiful with the perfection of womanhood. The light brown hair with a glint of gold; the delicate, regular features, the fair complexion, the eyes that sparkled with health and happiness, and the slight but well rounded figure, blended together into exquisite loveliness.

Maidie kissed her and exclaimed, "Why, Evelyn, when did you come back?"

"I came back last night and started out the first thing this morning to see some of my old friends. Lottie is at the door in her wheel chair."

The years had brought changes to Minington. The Black Acre was broader and blacker; the culm heaps were higher; another breaker had been built and the number of breaker boys doubled; the great strike had come and gone leaving sorrow and desolation in many homes.

They had also brought changes to the Kirklins, who no longer occupied the miner's cottage in the Black Acre, but lived in a neat house on Monroe St., and the rooms were no longer bare, but furnished in a plain, tasteful manner.

Maidie invited the girls in but Evelyn said, "Why can't we sit on the steps in the sunshine here beside Lottie's chair?"

Little crippled Lottie had also grown to womanhood. She would never walk again but she had made her life useful, for it had broadened and blossomed under the influence of helpful, loving friends.

"You don't know how surprised I was when I saw Lottie in her new chair," said Evelyn.

"She has Aunt Mehetabel to thank for that," said Mrs. Kirklin.

"Yes, and for a great many other things, too," said Lottie. "My correspondence course in kindergarten, for instance."

"Evelyn, it would do you good to see Lottie's kindergarten," said Mrs. Kirklin.

"Well, I am going to see it this afternoon. It just fills my heart with joy when I think of it."

"Well, Aunt Mehetabel is not the only one I have to thank for that," said Lottie, "if it had not been for you, Evelyn, I don't think I would ever have learned even to read and write. It was you who put all those higher ideals into my life. You remember I was so dull and my speech so broken, that it seemed as though I could never learn to read; but you would not give up. Then you brought me books and it all helped, and now that I can pass it on to the other little children, is indeed a joy. I can never hope to do as much as those that are able to get about, but the children are almost more than feet to me. They seem to anticipate my every want, and if I need my chair moved to another part of the room, or something brought to me, there are a dozen little hands ready."

"They cannot very well do otherwise; you love them so much and are always planning such nice little surprises for them," said Maidie. "I went to visit Lottie's kindergarten one afternoon last week, Evelyn, and there were thirty little children there about the happiest you ever saw; and would you believe that Lottie has actually succeeded in getting them to come with clean faces and hands? They were all shining as though they had been polished for the occasion."

"Where did you get the little red chairs?" asked Evelyn.

"Oh, from the same source that we have had so many nice things, Aunt Mehetabel, of course. You know I had rough, rude benches for the children, and one day a man came to the door and said he had a load of chairs for Miss Lottie Rominiski. I told him there must be some mistake, but he said that was the name, so I submitted."

"I am going to furnish you with an assistant next summer," said Evelyn, "that is, if you will have her."

"Oh, Evelyn, can you mean that you are going to help me?"

"Yes, we will go into partnership."

"How splendid that will be," said Lottie, "I will have a chance to learn so many things."

"You graduate in June, do you not, Evelyn?" asked Mrs. Kirklin.

"Yes," said Evelyn, "and what do you suppose I am going to do next year?"

"Oh, tell us," said Lottie.

(Copyright, 1905, Ella N. Wood.)

"I am going south, I think to Georgia, to teach in one of those large, cotton-mill towns."

"We might have known it would be something of that kind," said Mrs. Kirklin. "You will never be happy, Evelyn, unless you are helping the mill children or the breaker boys."

"I long to stay here in Minington, but my father does not think the time is quite ripe for any special work along that line." Turning to Mrs. Kirklin Evelyn said, "Did you know father was looking for an assistant?"

"No, I did not know it, but I am glad. The wonder is that he has not broken down long ago."

"If he finds one, he will push the settlement movement that he has had in his heart so long."

"If he does that he will need you, Evelyn."

"Yes, it has been the dream of my life for several years to do something like that for the working people in Minington."

Mrs. Kirklin went into the house and returned with a picture in her hand.

"Evelyn, I have something to show you," and she handed Evelyn the picture.

"Oh, Mrs. Kirklin! This is Jean, is it not?"

"Yes, Evelyn, would you have known him?" and Maidie's face beamed with motherly pride.

"Yes, I would have known him. While he has changed in many respects, he has the same look in his face that he had when he was a boy."

"Mrs. Kirklin, I have been talking to Evelyn about Jean and how splendid he is, but I cannot begin to tell half of it."

"I hope, Evelyn, you will soon have a chance to find out for yourself," said Maidie.

As Evelyn looked at the picture, she thought, "No wonder Lottie is enthusiastic. It scarcely seems possible that this manly face and splendid physique belong to the slender, stoop-shouldered breaker boy whom I tried to teach how to read and write."

All of Jean's trips to Minington chanced to have been made while Evelyn was away at school, so the years had passed without their meeting, and the change in Jean was so great that it seemed almost incredible. She had heard much about him from her mother and Lottie, and had rejoiced at his good fortune, but the image already in her mind had been too firmly fixed to be dispelled in that manner, and as she now looked at his picture, and realized all that time had done, the old interest she used to feel for him was awakened and she longed to see him.

"Jean has been Mr. Snow's private secretary for two or three years," said Maidie.

"Yes, so mother told me," replied Evelyn, "but I don't see how he is able to do that and keep up his college work."

"Oh, he has an assistant. He could not possibly do it alone. Mr. Snow says Jean knows more about his business and can look after it better than any one he has ever had, and it pleases Jean very much to be able to do it."

"When will he graduate?" asked Evelyn.

"A year from June," answered Maidie. "This is the week of his spring vacation. I hoped he might be able to run down for a day, but fear he cannot this time."

The ladies were so intent in their conversation that they did not see a figure turn up the walk, but hearing a quick step they all looked up and before them stood Jean. He laughed at their surprise, but noticing Evelyn, a shade of embarrassment passed over his face.

"Oh Jean! we were just talking about you," said Maidie as she sprang to meet him. He kissed her lovingly and turning shook hands with Lottie.

"Jean, you remember Evelyn, do you not?" asked his mother. As she spoke, the vision of a little girl with a pink gingham dress and sunny curls flashed through Jean's memory. He saw her bending over his shoulder and guiding his pencil with her small, fair hand. Was this the same Evelyn? Memory had kept the picture fresh in his mind, and the little hand had seemed to guide and beckon all through the years; but the child had vanished and he stood face to face with the woman. For an instant the old, bashful shrinking that he used to feel when they were children came over him, then he reached out his hand and said, "Yes indeed, I do remember her. I am more than glad to renew the acquaintance again, Miss Hathaway."

"Oh, Jean, don't say 'Miss Hathaway,' said Mrs. Kirklin. "You are nothing but grown up children yet and it must still be Jean and Evelyn."

They all laughed and felt more at ease.

"Mrs. Kirklin has just been showing me your picture," said Evelyn, who still held Jean's picture in her hand. "I cannot quite get it through my head yet that it is really you."

"I have been trying to solve a similar problem," said Jean. "Suppose we submit them to Lottie. How is it, Lottie?"

"I can't see that either of you has changed a bit, only Jean is very much grown up, but you are just the same Jean and Evelyn to me that you always were."

They all laughed merrily at this.

"How long can you stay with us?" asked his mother.

"Mither, I hate to tell you that I must go back tonight. I must go to Pittsburgh tomorrow with Uncle Jasper, and have at least a month's work to crowd into this week. But how good it is to get this one glimpse of you. Where is father?"

"He went down town this morning, but I think he will be back soon."

"If I were not afraid of robbing your mother, I would ask you to call before you leave, so I will extend the invitation to your next visit." said Evelyn to Jean as she rose to go.

"I shall certainly call when I come again; your father and I are excellent friends."

"Father is in Harrisburg and I fear I will not get to see him before I return to school."

"Oh yes," said Jean, "your father and Doctor Jones have gone there to push the child labor bill in the legislature."

"Yes," said Evelyn, "we had a letter from him this morning and he feels very much discouraged at the prospects."

"Well, I certainly hope they will win out," said Jean.

When Lottie and Evelyn had gone, Mrs. Kirklin looked at Jean and said, "What do you think of Evelyn?"

"The same as I have always thought, mither. When we were children she seemed like an angel to me."

"She is one of God's good angels, Jean," and they went into the house.

(To be continued.)

The Christian College Woman.

By Arthur S. Phelps.

Womanhood is not manufactured by the university. The picture of your life is painted only from the color in your tube. The perfume of the garden is hidden in seed and soil. The glory of a woman is her femininity; and femininity includes four things—gentleness, purity, sympathy, simplicity. The ideal is conceived by its suggestion in the real. My friend stood before the "Venus de Milo" in the Louvre, and wept at the perfection of grace and glory he saw there, and came away declaring that he should never marry; the Venus de Milo was his bride. Though he has since become the happy father of eight children, the ideal of the young student is still the ideal of the college president. When his views of marriage changed, he said his wife must have "a good body, a good mind, a good heart and a good cheer." All of these he finds realized in the beautiful woman in his home. Side by side with the "Venus" of the Louvre, I like to place Michael Angelo's "Pieta" of St. Peter's not as equally perfect in art, but because the storms of life have left their traces on the face of the mother.

As the Christian young woman enters college this fall, let her resolve that she will not try to be other than God made her. I found the French women the best dressed women in the world. They say American ladies follow prevailing styles blindly, whether they are personally becoming or not; but that the French adapt their dress to their individual turn of figure. Michael Angelo, surveying the products of his original genius, exclaimed with a sigh: "How many painters will my work shipwreck!" We can now look back upon the foolish extremes into which his servile imitators ran. How often is natural sweetness degraded into a goodness a la mode!

"There are those who are good, but sorely they try us,
For it seems that their goodness is cut on the bias!"

Education enables a woman to make a determination of relative values. The universal humanizing tendency of our day has nowhere made itself more noticeably felt than in university teaching. Science has a new biology, a new anthropology, a new sociology. English literature and the modern languages thrill with an international touch. History is no longer a sensational story of epoch-making wars, merely; it is a serial biography of race-leaders. There is a wholesome mental sameness in modern academic training, arising from a judicial rating of values. A "crank" is one who puts secondary things first. All false and temporary sects and systems find their origin here. The real character of an individual is determined by his estimates, no less than is the influence of public utterance and private conversation. We are continually misplacing emphasis, and taking the wrong path. A newspaper says: "Many a lady who would not soil her white hands by touching a black stove, will soil her white soul by reading French novels." Life is a process of selection, as truly as in a library, or a dry goods store. The wise advice is applicable: "Don't buy anything just because it is cheap." Good goods cost. The college student will get what she is willing to pay the price for.

Education is an atmosphere, not a collection of curiosities, nor even a kit of tools. This is the significance of the halo in paintings of the holy family, of the nimbus, of the tongues of fire. A college training is thrown away on the callow graduate for whom it has done nothing more than enable her to talk oracularly in the parlor about "culture." Sentiment is the highest thing in a young woman's life, sentimentality one of the cheapest things. Of 6,123 recent suicides, 61 per cent—three-fifths—were girls. A high education is stored power, static energy, a dwelling of the soul in the eternal. It is the door of service, the key to the human heart, a life-long debt to the ignorant.

Los Angeles, Cal.

He Obeyed.

There is something extremely disconcerting in the unexpected application of parental instruction; and the quick-witted small boy is an adept in the practice. "Don't say 'goin'' and 'skatin', Tom; always pronounce your 'g's'" says mamma, whereupon Tom looks up wickedly and replies: "I thought you were always telling me not to say 'Gee!'" Italian boys in a somewhat different spirit, perhaps, occasionally bring their elders up short by the same method of ill-timed obedience to the letter of the law. The author of "A Tuscan Childhood," Lisi Cipriani, relates an incident of her small brother whose most glaring fault was that he would interrupt. He had been corrected repeatedly and instructed to say: "At your convenience, mamma, I have something to tell you." This is how he bettered the instruction:

One day toward the end of the season my mother had taken Ritchie and me to the baths at Leghorn. The baths are built on piers and rotundas into the sea. We have no tide at Leghorn, and these piers are connected by bridges. Before the autumn storms begin the boards are taken away, so that only two long wooden beams and the railings remain. There was absolutely no danger in walking across these bridges on the beams, as we could have all necessary support from the railings, and it was great fun. I had crossed one of these bridges quite a distance from where my mother and some friends were sitting. When I started to return I forgot that the boards had been taken away, and walked splash into the sea.

Ritchie, who was standing by me, instead of taking the slightest concern as to what would happen to me, rapidly crossed the bridge and ran to my mother. Taking off his cap, the little fellow stood politely beside her for some time, waiting till she had finished a rather long story she was just telling. Then he said:

"Mamma, at your convenience, I have something to tell you."

"What is it?" said my mother, approvingly, for she appreciated that her efforts were being rewarded.

"Mamma, at your convenience, Lisi has fallen into the water."

"What!" exclaimed my mother, jumping up. "Has any one pulled her out?"

"I don't know," said Ritchie, very politely, "but I did not interrupt your story, and she can swim."

Rebirth of Bruges.

After more than four centuries of stagnation Bruges, once the commercial capital of Europe, is to regain some of its ancient prosperity. The sea has been restored to it. A canal has been cut from the city to the sea and a new port constructed, and a way made by which the quaint old city of the lace-makers may handle some of the current of trade which passes between the ocean and the hinterland.

In the middle of the fifteenth century Bruges was the busiest and richest city, if not the largest, in Europe. It was situated on a canal which had been so built as to form a branch of the Zwyn estuary, was a principal market of the Hanseatic League, and had at its wharves shipping from all the world. When Paris numbered 120,000 people Bruges had a fourth more. Its factories were never idle, its merchants became princes, its many canals were alive with boats bound for inland places.

But in the course of time it was found that the arm of the sea was filling with drifting sands. Efforts were made to stay the process, but without success. Year by year the waters shoaled and by the middle of the sixteenth century Bruges was but an inland town, the empty shell of former greatness.

A canal twenty-six feet deep has been dredged through the sand, about eight miles in a straight line to the North Sea. There immense concrete jetties make a new "fore port" for Bruges, where passengers and express freight can be transferred to rail. Heavy goods will pass through a lock to the canal, and so to a great new basin at the city itself, where all the canals have access to wharves and quays. A city of Zeebrugge, or Sea-Bruges, has been established at the mouth of the canal. Bruges itself has already felt the impetus, and it is rapidly growing again, the population in 1900 being more than 50,000. Its paupers, of which it has the largest proportion of any European city, are diminishing, and prosperity seems at hand. Nothing more picturesque has been attempted by the engineers in recent years than this restoration of trade to a forgotten capital, this re-introduction of the sea through the treacherous dunes to the ancient City of Bridges.—Youth's Companion.

The Sunday-School Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

DAVID THE KING.*

It might have been supposed, considering David's popularity in Israel, and the death of Saul and his sons, that no time would be lost in opening David's way to the throne. Yet such was not the case. Matters moved but slowly in that direction. There was no immediate attempt made to put anyone in that place. The people of the central and northern region in which Saul's kingdom lay were too badly shattered by the recent events to take any steps toward reorganization of the government. The Philistines were in control as far east as the Jordan, and nothing could be done.

The Delay.

It is a significant fact that five years passed before any efforts were made to secure a king in Saul's place. Then Abner, Saul's chief general, who in some unexplained manner had survived the battle of Mount Gilboa, took Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, and made him king in Mahanaim, east of the Jordan. It is apparent that it was not safe to attempt any west-Jordan movement as yet. The Philistines were too strong, and Ish-bosheth lacked the qualities of leadership which could have promised success in such an effort.

David in Judah.

Meantime David was securing the throne of Judah. From the beginning of his outlaw life he had never forgotten that he might win the kingship. In his relations with the Philistines he had taken care never to break with his own people. Even when he represented himself to the king of Gath as committing depredations on the cities of Judah he was in reality taking great pains to do nothing of the kind, but only to make raids on their common foes. More than this, he sent portions of the spoil from these raids against the Bedouin and the Amalekites to the elders of cities both in Judah and the north, so that they looked upon him with great favor.

The Open Way.

When at last Saul's death removed the last obstacle to his return to his land, he consulted the oracle as to the wisdom of going back among his own people of Judah. The response was favorable, and the place selected was Hebron. This was in itself a sanctuary, having been held in reverence from days long prior to Abraham's residence there. The burial place of the patriarchs in the cave of Machpelah added to this feeling of sanctity. Then, too, Hebron was admirably situated for defense, at the highest point in the south, and it would give David an opportunity to develop his government at a distance from any contrary activity on the part of the house of Saul. To Hebron, accordingly, David went, taking not only his own household, but the numerous colony he had gathered about him in the outlaw period. These free companions had been his only protection in the days of his misfortunes. They now became the nucleus of his army, and constituted a sort of old guard or tent legion, given special rank and quarters among the forces of the kingdom.

David King of Judah.

It was not long before circumstances, aided no doubt by David's admirable diplomacy, suggested to the men of Judah the wisdom of making him their king. He had all the qualities which appealed to them as suitable in a leader. He was young, handsome, brave, generous, persistent, shrewd, and marked by that element of enthusiasm which can command the passionate attachment of army and people. His romantic exploits had made him a popular hero. The suggestion that he be made king met with ardent approval, and in what appears to have been a mass meeting of the tribe of Judah, he was chosen to the position. It was now his task to secure not only his present honor, but even more to prepare for its extension to all Israel.

David and the North.

He had already made efforts to win the good will of the northern towns by gifts of spoil to their chiefs. He now went further. To the men of Jabesh-gilead, who had nobly carried off the bodies of Saul and his sons from the walls of Beth-shan, to save them from further mutilation, he sent a message of congratulation and good will, which must have pleased not only the people who received it, but also the adherents of the house of Saul. There were outbreaks of hostility between the partisans of David and those of Abner, the chief representative of Saul's family. But David must have deprecated and repressed such displays of zeal, as likely to endanger rather than assist his plans. In fact, one of these encounters came near ruining all his hopes for a friendly settlement with the claims of the house of Saul. In one of the chance meetings of the troops of the two factions, Abner killed Asahel, a brother of Joab, David's chief general. It was no private feud, but a fair and open fight, in which Abner had expressly warned the younger man against an encounter with him.

Joab's Revenge.

But Joab cherished dark thoughts of revenge, and when later on, Abner, disgusted with the weakness and temper of his master, Ish-bosheth, made overtures to David in a journey to Hebron, Joab seized the opportunity afforded by the presence of his foe in David's capital and murdered him. Nothing but a prompt and emphatic repudiation of Joab's act by David, and a great public funeral, saved the king from suspicion of complicity in the foul deed. But the king's conduct on this occasion not only allayed public uneasiness, but raised him higher in the love of his people, and even of the north.

David King of Israel.

The result of all these slow happenings appeared not long after in a strong movement to extend David's rule over the entire nation. There came to Hebron a deputation of elders from the northern cities presenting their petition that he become their king. That this was what David had hoped and worked to secure from the first cannot be doubted. He combined the elements of personal popularity and adroit diplomacy, which made his selection inevitable. He now saw the successful consummation of his plans. To be sure he was little more than nominal king of a ruined country. The Philistines were yet in control of large tracts of the land. But David had already won a place of vantage in Judah, and to extend his realm was pleasant work for such a man. He must have a more central capital than Hebron. He must have an army of greater size and strength. He must have a palace and a sanctuary. All these plans were doubtless made in the days at Hebron, but when once the league with the northern tribes had been arranged, and David felt himself secure in his power, he lost no time in bringing to pass the ambitious designs he had cherished. He was no longer leader of a tribe; he had a nation behind him. He was no longer the prince of Judah; he was now the king of Israel.

GREAT ENDINGS TO GOOD LIVES.

Topic—September 16, John 17:4; Acts 7:54-60; 2 Tim. 4:6-8.

"When I was making my defense I thought I ought not to do anything unworthy of a freeman just because I was in danger, and I have no misgivings now over the manner of my defense. No, I would far rather defend myself as I did, and die, than owe my life to a craven defense. For it is wrong for me, and for any one else, either in a lawsuit or in battle, to resort to every possible device in order to escape death. In battle it is often plain that a man may at least save his life by throwing down his arms and imploring quarter of his pursuers. And in other kinds of danger there are plenty of devices whereby a man may save his life, if he has the audacity to say and do anything and everything. But, my friends, I suspect the difficulty is, not to escape death, but rather to escape wickedness. For wickedness runs swifter than death, and now I who am old and slow have been caught by the slower runner, while my accusers who are clever and swift have been caught by the faster runner, which is wickedness. And now I depart having been condemned to death by you. They, too, depart condemned by truth to pay the penalty of depravity and unrighteousness. I abide by my punishment; let them abide by theirs. I suppose those things are destined to be; and I think it is best for all." There is something for the Christian to ponder in these words of Socrates to his judges.

"I Have Finished the Work."

When Jesus came to the end of his life, his work was done. There were no vain regrets on account of lost opportunities. There was no need to apologize for half-hearted support of righteous causes. He did all that God gave him to do. Of no other can this be said. There are many whose lives are pleasant to remember. We can say of them that they have finished their work, but we do not mean that they left nothing undone. At the passing of the best men and women love must cover their faults while it erects memorials of their good deeds. Jesus met death as no other met it because he had lived as no other ever lived.

"Lay Not This Sin to Their Charge."

Stephen died surrounded by madmen. A half-witted man has more sense than ten thousand men in a mob. Stephen spoke to his countrymen of the universal religion. They thought he was attacking the foundations of their ancient faith. They accused him of blasphemy, and when they could not answer his arguments, they stoned him to death. But he won and they lost. He prayed for them that they might not have the sin of killing him laid against them. They were on the side that could not stand the truth. They looked to the past; they feared the future. Stephen knew the future would vindicate him, for he knew he was right. It was possible, therefore for him to pity the foolish men who were the destroyers of his life. Their seeming triumph was their ruin, and he knew it.

"I Have Kept the Faith.

Not until we have been tried and approved can we appreciate the feeling of Paul when he wrote his parting words to Timothy. The traitor cannot begin to tell us what Paul meant. But the man who has preserved his ideals of honesty in business in the face of temptations to enrich himself at the expense of the poor can understand Paul and rejoice in his faithfulness. The preacher who resists the inclination to bid for cheap applause and subjects himself to the scorn and ridicule of bad men in the church and out of it in order that he may be on good terms with his conscience and be able to give a good account of his stewardship before God is aware that it costs something to be faithful. But the cost is nothing as compared with the joy of it. Paul could respect himself because he had been true to his Master. He looked for the crown of righteousness which the Lord gives to his faithful servants.

Lesson XIV. The Priestly Histories.

Two types of historical books appear in the Old Testament, the prophetic and the priestly histories. Neither is written as we write history today, for the interest of both is in religion rather than in the events of past or present as such. None the less, certain of these events are selected to serve as the illustrations of the principles of the higher life.

The prophetic histories were insistent upon the moral conduct of individuals and the nation. They point out the fact that men are happy and prosperous in proportion to their obedience to the will of God as expressed by the prophets. The priestly historians on the other hand magnify the place of the ritual of religion in the life of the people, and attempt to show that the great and successful kings of Israel and Judah were those who gave attention to the priestly rites of the sanctuary and honored these members of the religious establishment.

The two books of Chronicles are the most representative books of this class. They were originally one, and were indeed joined to Ezra and Nehemiah. By what means they became separated we do not know. First Chronicles opens with a genealogical list which runs back to Adam, and Second Chronicles ends at the opening of the exile, the place where the books of Kings leave their story. To a considerable extent therefore the books of Samuel-Kings run parallel with Chronicles. They are indeed both taken from the same earlier sources, as a comparison of their form will show. Yet their spirit and purpose are quite different. Samuel-Kings lays emphasis upon tthe dangers and consequences of sin. Chronicles glorifies the spectacular and priestly elements of the national life. There is also a tendency on the part of the Chronicler to read back into earlier time the institutions and ideals of his own age, and to exaggerate the numbers he uses. These facts have led many scholars to regard Chronicles as of little historical value. Yet this judgment must not carry too far. The books are easily seen to have a value of their own, even though they may not be as trustworthy to the historian as the great prophetic histories. The date of Chronicles is in the late post-exilic period. The last person mentioned in the record is Juddua, the high priest contemporary with Alexander the Great, 333 B. C.

Ezra and Nehemiah follow Chronicles and are closely connected with it in form and spirit. Indeed a study of these books soon convinces one that the hand by which they were written was the same one that wrote the books of Chronicles. But the nucleus in both cases is the personal memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah respectively. These men each left journals containing the important events of their lives during the time of their residence in Judah, and these are the foundation material which the Chronicler used in writing the books. It is also apparent that the narratives of these two reformers in Judah after the exile have become mixed and confused in the books as we now have them. Nehemiah came to Jerusalem from his official position in the court of Persia about 445 B. C. He found the city still without walls, though the temple had been built. He secured the coöperation of the people, and built the walls in a very short time. He then continued as governor of the province for a period of twelve years, and after a visit to Persia returned once more to his task.

Later on came Ezra, about the year 397 B. C., and completed what Nehemiah, had begun, by instructing the people in the law which he brought with him from the Jewish community in Persia, which was much more numerous, progressive and scrupulous regarding the law. The most drastic part of Ezra's reforms related to the mixed marriages of Jews with the women of the neighboring nations. These the scribe not only forbade, but he compelled many who had contracted such marriages to separate themselves from their families. This spirit of exclusiveness no doubt did much to make the Jews of later days the narrow and exclusive people they became.

The little book of Esther is more a romance than a history, yet it may have some foundation in fact, and was certainly greatly prized by the Jews in spite of, perhaps on account of, its fierce spirit of hatred against the heathen world. Even its heroine shares the same spirit, and considers the slaughter of a great number of non-Jews an appropriate and desirable thing. The historical difficulties presented by the book have led many modern scholars to regard it as less a record of facts than an appeal to the national pride and patriotism. The date was in the late Persian period.

Literature—The section in the introductions of Driver, McFadyen and Bennett and Adeney. Also the articles on the books named, in Hastings Bible Dictionary and the Encyclopaedia Biblica.

The Ocean looketh up to heaven
As 'twere a living thing;
The homage of its waves is given
In ceaseless worshipping.
They kneel upon the sloping sand,
As bends the human knee;
A beautiful and tireless band,
The priesthood of the sea!—J. G. Whittier.

All growth in the spiritual life is connected with the clearer insight into what Jesus is to us. The more we realize that Christ must be all to us and in us, that all in Christ is indeed for us, the more we shall learn to live the real life of faith which, dying to self, lives wholly in Christ. The Christian life is no longer the vain struggle to live right, but the resting in Christ and finding strength in him as our life, to fight the fight and gain the victory of faith.—Andrew Murray.

Willing to Work.

He is a very rich man now, and he made his fortune one morning while he was still a boy. A fortune is not made when the last thousand dollars have been gathered and counted; it is made when a boy or man takes the decisive step towards success, or shows the decisive quality which will sooner or later command it. For success, although sometimes a matter of opportunity, is rarely a matter of accident; and even when it is a matter of opportunity, the harvest is not gathered in unless there is a strong man ready to do the reaping. This man showed the stuff that was in him by a little advertisement in a local newspaper: "A willing boy wants work." That was notice to the world that a capable, trustworthy boy was to be had, who would not measure his work by his wages, but put his mind and heart into it; and the world is always on the watch for that kind of a notice, because it needs the boy who is behind it and is anxious to employ him. To be both willing to work and eager for the chance is to set one's feet squarely on the road to success at the start; after that it is only a matter of time. The road is full of half-hearted, uninterested shirkers who would stop and rest from their labors if somebody would give them food and clothes, and of unambitious drudges who plod along and do as little as they can. The boy who has trained himself to run and is eager to put forth his strength goes straight to the front. The willing boys who want to work always get it.

And what is true of boys is equally true of men. The willing man is rarely out of work. If half the energy put into getting more wages and cutting down hours were put into cheerful, faithful, competent work, far more would be accomplished in the way of securing better conditions. In every department of life, willingness and competency are at a premium because so few men, relatively, put real heart and skill into what they are doing. A host of men are continually inveighing against general conditions, the order of the world, the hardness of life, the indifference of Providence. Society is full of men of good character and fair industry who never take the trouble to make themselves masters of the thing they are doing, and who, when the time of slackness comes and they are dropped from the list of active workers, do not understand that they have discharged themselves. As a matter of fact, except in very rare cases, no man need be discharged. It is possible for even the average man, by zeal and hard work, to get such a grasp of the thing committed to him that his employer cannot afford to lose him. Almost every man who chooses can make himself invaluable. As a rule, men discharge themselves because they do not make themselves necessary. Willingness is the beginning of this process of education in skill. The great majority of men fail because they do not work hard enough or intelligently enough. They are content to do what is set before them, and they do it fairly well, but they do not do it supremely well. In every field of work the complaint is heard on all sides that it is difficult to get a man who takes an interest in his work and does it with thoroughness. Niggardliness of effort and slovenliness of manner are characteristic of a host of men who might be expert workmen if they chose. They lack willingness; they are not willing to endure the discipline, to give the time, to deny themselves in order to get their tools thoroughly in hand. The willing man, except in very rare periods, can always find work. People are glad to have him about.—The Outlook.

A Thorough Demonstration.

"My dear, you must not fidget so with your handkerchief when you're in the pulpit," said the minister's wife, as she walked home by his side after the morning service.

"Fidget!" exclaimed the gentleman. "Why, I seldom use my handkerchief. What do you mean?"

"I don't mean using it," replied the wife, laughing. "I hope you will do that whenever it's necessary; but I mean pulling it out of one pocket and stuffing it into another, only to take it out and thrust it under the hymn-book. It's a nervous habit, and it's perfectly distracting to watch you."

The clergyman looked kindly incredulous as he said:

"I think you must be mistaken, my dear. I might have changed it about a good deal this morning, I believe I did, but I'm certain that it isn't a habit. To prove it, I'll leave my handkerchief with you this evening." It was agreed.

At the close of the invocation the minister's hand was seen withdrawing itself stealthily from his coat-tail pocket, and after he had said, "Let us continue our worship by singing three stanzas" —there was a long pause while he fumbled in the other coat tail before he added—"of the three hundred and forty-third hymn."

By keeping his mind on his hands instead of on the hymn, he managed to get through the singing with only one slip; but there were several awkward pauses during the responsive reading, when the minister's wife watched his hands roam from breast pocket to pulpit cushion and back to his coat tail again.

During the anthem the minister seemed less absent-minded, but his wife was uneasy when it came time for the prayer, and discreetly covered her eyes. Then he grew more and more distracted, and kept the audience waiting with hymn-books in hand while he made another search for the missing bit of linen before giving out the number of the hymn.

Finally it was time for the sermon. "I invite your attention this evening," he began, and then stopped. This time his hand was in his breast pocket. "You will find my text," he began again, "in the eighth chapter of Romans." The little lady in the pew had gained her point, but really it was ceasing to be a joke. He could never get through his sermon at this rate. Hastily she beckoned to an usher and sent him into the pulpit with the minister's handkerchief. He clutched it with ill-concealed relief, and shot a guilty glance at his smiling wife. Then he drew a long breath, and, as one set free, went on with his admirable sermon.—Youth's Companion.

Busy Mr. Frog.

"Hello, Mr. Frog, what are you doin' in my garden?" said Jimmie to the big brown toad that was sitting in the middle of the lettuce bed in his "corner" of his father's garden.

"Hello, Mr. Frog, I said, what are you doin' in my garden?"

But Mr. Frog answered never a word. He just sat there and looked solemnly at Jimmie out of his bright, beady eyes.

"Well, Mr. Frog," Jimmie persisted, "if you won't tell me what you are doin', I'll just wait and see what you're doin'."
